BRITISH PRIME MINISTER EXCELLENT BUSINESS MAN, COUSIN OF KIPLING

Stanley Baldwin is the first British Premier of whom it might be said that his chief claim to international fame is that he is the cousin of a poet. At present there can be no doubt that the name of Rudyard Kipling means more to the world than the name of Stanley Baldwin. But his blood relationship to one of the most illustrious of Englishmen was not one of the reasons why he was called upon to take the place of Bonar Law. He was chosen because he is believed to be one of the shrewdest, sanest and most business-like men in the public life of the Old Country, and because the present political complexion of the House of Commons made it in the highest degree inadvisable that any but a commoner should be Prime Minister. Mr. Baldwin's rivals for the post are all members of the Lords—Curzon, Balfour, Derby and Devonshire, and it happens that the official Opposition has no spokesman in the Lords. It is a matter of common sense that the leader of the Opposition should be able to debate matters with the Prime Minister directly. This would not be possible if one were in the Lords and the other in the Commons.

The new Prime Minister has one achievement of the first magnitude to his credit as well as many smaller tasks faithfully performed. It was he who arranged for the funding of the British debt to the United States and at the same time made both countries as well satisfied with the bargain as it is possible in the nature of things that they should be. He proved himself a fine business man in his dealings at Washington, and one his return to England he showed that he was also a good politician, for he explained that the sentiment of the west and middle west in the United States made it impossible for him to get the precise terms he would have desired. Immediately the typical western statesman assailed him, but he only smiled. He had scored his point. A few evenings later the American Ambassador challenged his facts in rather a provocative way at a dinner. Again Baldwin smiled and talked about something else, leaving it for Earl Balfour to make an answer. The main thing was that the debt was funded on terms agreed to by both countries and with a minimum of irritation.

Another remarkable thing he did has been by this time generally forgotten in England where similar sacrifices were not unknown. Though he toiled patriotically in the war as a government official he was over the age limit for active service. He was represented at the front by two sons. This, however, did not satisfy him, so he had his entire private fortune independently assessed, and turned over one-fourth of it as a free-will gift to the British Exchequer. He is a protectionist, a Tory and a die-hard, but one of his sons is a Socialist, a fact which does not impair their affectionate relations in the slightest. The new Prime Minister is credited with a fine sense of humor, and in the descriptions of him we have read, we note that he is accused of grinning rather than smiling. There is something rather boyish and extremely likeable about him, which is indicated by the fact that when the King called him to Buckingham Palace he took a taxi from the ranks instead of proceeding in greater state in his Rolls-Royce. He is also a confirmed pipe smoker, a fact which might also serve to place him.

Stanley Baldwin comes of a solid Worcestershire County family, one which has always produced loyal supporters of the King, and occasionally men who have distinguished themselves. On his mother's side one perceives something akin to genius. His maternal grandfather was Rev. George MacDonald, a Methodist minister, who often has been spoken of as the father of "four remarkable daughters." They were women remarkable for their beauty and charm. One of them was married by Sir Edward Burne-Jones, the painter, and inspired him to depict the type of saintly loveliness with which his name is associated. Another was wed by Sir Edward Poynter, president of the Royal Academy; the third became the bride of Lockwood Kipling, an Indian official, and the fourth became the wife of Alfred Baldwin, who was to become a steel magnate and the father of the Prime Minister. This Methodist minister, if he were alive today, might take considerable pride in the fact that he would be the grandfather of two baronets, a great poet and the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Stanley Baldwin went to Harrow, and Trinity College, Cambridge, after which he entered his father's business, and his training has been in steel, railways and finance. It is said that on one occasion when the Baldwin employees were forced to strike because of a labor dispute in which they had no direct part, he paid their wages out of his own pocket. He must have been well liked, for an industrialist who is not approved by labor would not have had such plain sailing to political preferment as has been the case with the Prime Minister. He enjoys social relaxation, and like most Englishmen of his class is interested in some sort of hobby. Mr. Baldwin's is the breeding of pigs at his place in the Severn Valley. He is compactly built, slightly below medium height, affable, approachable, and so far has cultivated no mannerisms that have caught the eye of the cartoonist.

Running on schedule the Canadian Pacific Steamship's liner "Empress of Canada," Captain A. J. Hailey, again demonstrated her right to the claim of "Queen of the Pacific." The Canadian vessel left Vancouver twenty-four hours behind the American liner "President McKinley" bound for Yokohama recently. The "Empress of Canada" docked about 3 A.M., and the "President McKinley" arrived at 8 A.M.
