

IRATE MAN TELLS CHINAMAN
TO GO BACK HOME TO EUROPE

(New York Sun)

One of the old wives' tales concerning the Chinese people is that they lack an adaptable sense of humor, one that does not catch the turn of Occidental wit and understand what is ludicrous. An incident that, in a way, disproves this occurred recently on the high platform of the Chatham Square elevated station, where Mott street takes its trains uptown.

On the platform were several Chinese men, including three young men. All wore American clothes, of course, but the poorly tailored coats sat on their shoulders in that curious manner which betrays the wearer as a foreigner more accustomed to his native costumes. There came up the stairs a little, wizened man. He wore a cap and there were spectacles half way down his nose. He also carried a short cane of an inexpensive wood, which may have been a trophy rescued from a Bowery ash barrel. He was in every way disreputable and, to add to his sins, he was drunk. It was only a mild intoxication, and perhaps it was this unsatisfactory state that made him truculent.

"Uptown?" he asked the first Chinese. The answer was a shake of the head that signified to the derelict that the Chinese could not understand English. There was a hint in the manner of the Chinese, however, that he did not wish to converse with the little man.

The question was repeated again to another Chinese and, at last, to a third and to a fourth. Each answered with that same shrug. By this time the old fellow becoming very angry. He at last chose a white man and asked him, "Uptown?" The man nodded.

At this time the old fellow turned toward the Chinese men and begun to berate them in a grumbling tone. It was hard to understand his words because of obvious signs that a large cud of chewing tobacco was impeding his speech, but the words "America and "abusing citizens" could be distinguished. He grew more vexed when the Chinese made no sign that they heard him, and he finally stepped forward in a menacing manner, raised his stick and cried out, "Why don't you go back to Europe where you belong?"

The effect of this slight error in geography upon the Chinese was instantaneous. They burst out into laughter and one of them had to lean against the railing, so hearty was his appreciation of the little man's limitations.

By this time the old fellow was hopping up and down in a rage, but the laughter of the other white men near him had a placating effect. When the train drew up to the platform one of the Chinese turned and called out "Why don't you go back to Japan, where you belong, eh?"

"Sir," said the reporter to the man of the moment, "have you had any early struggles?"

"Yes," replied the celebrity cheerfully. "Fixing a stiff collar over a back stud."

Worse things may happen to a man whose wife runs away. She might come back.

ANOTHER BLACK EYE FOR THE
DIETING HABIT

(New York Sun)

The shopper stopped into a delicatessen where she had heard that particularly delicious homemade fudge was for sale.

"How much is the fudge, please?"

"Five cents a square."

"I'll have five squares."

"They're six for a quarter. Will you take the sixth one?"

"Why, of course," answered the shopper, delighted.

"How much are those chocolate nut cookies?"

"Ten cents apiece."

"I'll have five of them, too."

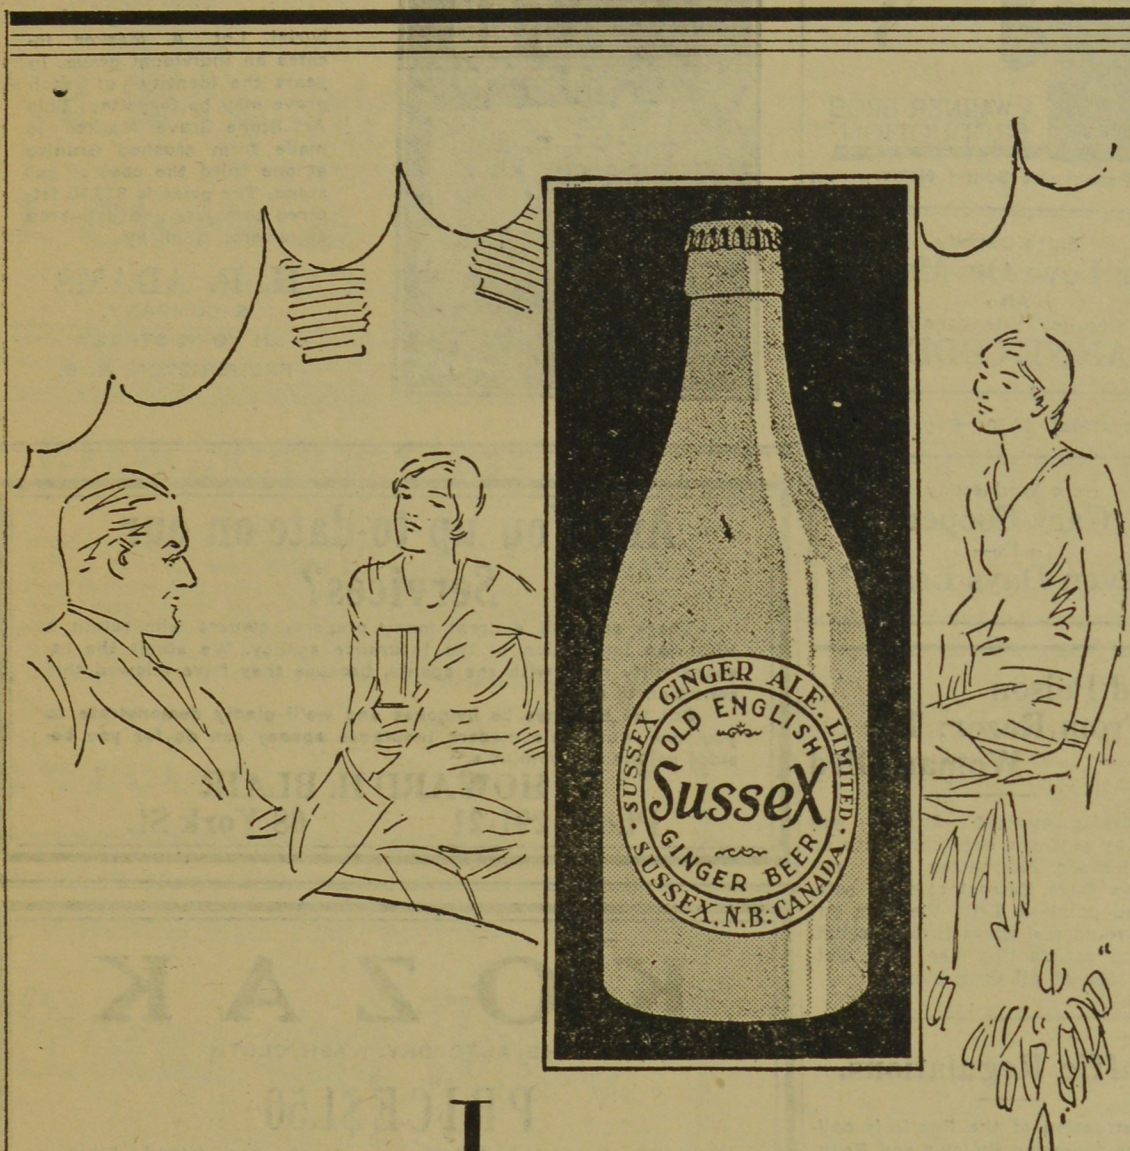

"You get six for fifty cents," said the clerk. "If you want the extra one."

The shopper drew back and looked the clerk in the eye.

"Of course I want it," she said indignantly. "Why do you even ask me; Is there a woman on earth who wouldn't take an extra piece of one of these delicious things if she got it free for nothing?"

"You'd be surprised," replied the clerk, "at how many times that extra piece is refused." She leaned forward confidentially. "These women who are dieting," she said. "Not supposed to be eating fudge and cookies. They're the ones who refuse it. They eat so virtuous to turn down an extra piece, that they can enjoy the rest of it. At least that's the way I've got it figured out."

"Well, I hope I don't look as though I were dieting," said the shopper, and she sounded guilty.
