

FAMOUS SINGING TEACHER
AGED 63 TOURS THE TROPICS

New York, July 25—Mme. Jessie Kaskerville, for many years coach to famous singers at the Metropolitan Opera House, is just getting around to doing some of the things she always wanted to do.
Mme. Baskerville is 63 years old, a grand age for a woman, she says for she is entirely free now to wander up and down the earth unchaperoned, even if it is the lion country of Africa, the Persian desert or the far reaches of the Orient. In fact, very recently she shot three leopards, of which she had a nice fur coat made for one of her friends.
Although she always had liked to travel and is adept in the study of languages, she managed, in her days of more sprightly youth, to get only to comparatively drab places such as England and Continental Europe. Her present extensive and adventurous winter travels, after a fashion, are accidental, the pleasant aftermath of something that started out as complete unpleasantness.
Must Thank Neuritis
Mme Maskerville is a protesting victim of neuritis. It began in the winter some six or eight years ago. And it is neuritis which she must thank when, with the first chill days of November she starts off on tramp steamers, by caravan, by native barges on African rivers, to the hot and fascinating primitive countries of the earth.
The expeditions usually takes about six months, for New York is her favorite city as well as her home, and with the first promise of hot weather on Manhattan Island she comes hurrying back to her studio Apartment in the Metropolitan Opera House about the time that most New Yorkers are hurrying in droves to the mountains and beaches.
This summer she is studying Russian, Arabic and Greek and coaching young music students who otherwise could not afford it. Since the war she has given up her career as professional opera coach, a career which brought her the friendships of many of the most famous singers and composers in this country and abroad. And when she has mastered these languages, in which she already can read, she will be able to speak all of the principal ones of the earth.
Likes Strange People
(Mme. Jessie) last winter's trip, which began in November and ended in May, took her first to the Canary Islands, then into the heart of Africa next up into the Atlas Mountains to visit an old friend, a missionary priest, and then back to New York by way of Paris.
Mme Jessie never plans her trips very much in advance, beyond heading in a general direction. Winter before last she took a tramp steamer down to the Canal Zone. There she suddenly fancied a voyage to the Solomon Isles. So she engaged passage by wireless on a French freighter. The captain was quite annoyed when he discovered that his passenger was a woman. But she had not been on the freighter two days before he spread a canvas on deck, had dinner served there with Mme. Jessie for company, and managed to produce a bit of music and dancing for her as well.
Her Trips to Africa
"A delightful time," says Mme. Jessie. "We talked about nearly everything under the sun, and he really was a good dancer."

In Africa this last season she traveled first in a small truck, the first conveyance that came to hand, along the path one evening at dusk. Her driver shot two lions crouching self, but does not care about hunting as a sport.
"I've killed monkeys," she said. "I hate to; they are such charming creatures. But once I went for a 42-day trip on the Niger River with six native boys, and they do love monkey stew."
The Niger River trip was several seasons back. It built up in her such an affection for Africa that the journey for the last season into the lion country resulted. That was topped off with the visit to her friends, the missionary priest, in the Atlas Mountains. She simply had to go, she explains, for after the lions she was pining for some good conversation.
Marseilles came after the visit to her clerical friend, and Marseilles was the beginning of another adventure, such an adventure as probably will remain memorable even for Mme. Jessie.
Travels by Taxi
When she arrived at Marseilles she found a large tourist delegation there. So that all hotels were either filled or prohibitive in price. So she got in a battered old taxi and asked the driver to drive her to Paris. He looked at her in amazement, for it's a long, hard trip from Marseilles to Paris in a taxi. However, he undertook the mission eagerly as he wanted to visit Paris. And Mme Baskerville's rather ritzy hotel on the Bois de Boulogne was startled when she arrived, dusty and dirty, in a clap-trap machine wheezing out its last breath.
"There is always," said Mme. Jessie, "some way to get anywhere. So I never bother much about making plans in advance."
Her first really long trip was made in 1914 on the volga and by the Caspian Sea to Persia, a two month's journey on little freight boats. She has taken a number of African trips to the interior, and once she took a trip through the Sahara Desert, on horseback, on camel and in a small truck. In Arabia she was proud that, after 60, she could manage an Arabian horse.

You can see her half a block away—the girl who handles the lipstick profusely.
