

R. B. HANSON HAS RECORD BREAKING MAJORITY IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF YORK-SUNBURY

The constituency of York-Sunbury yesterday re-elected R. B. Hanson, Conservative candidate to Parliament by a majority in excess of 5,000, the largest he has ever received. The Liberal candidate, J. J. F. Winslow, who was pressed into service at the eleventh hour will forfeit his deposit.

Mr. Hanson carried the two city polls by more than a two to one vote. He also carried every rural parish in the two counties by

R. B. HANSON, K.C., M.P.

Who yesterday was elected for York-Sunbury, for the fifth time, with a record majority thumping majorities, and nearly every poll pronounced in his favor. It was the most decisive victory ever achieved by a candidate for political honors in this constituency

Big Vote Polled

Despite the fact that the result of the election was a foregone conclusion a surprisingly large vote was polled. Mr. Hanson's total was about 1,500 greater than in the election of 1926, while Mr. Winslow polled about 200 more votes than did P. J. Hughes in the contest of that year. The Conservative forces were well organized at the different polls and succeeded in getting out almost every available vote. The Liberal organization on the other hand was weak compared with what they had in the provincial election.

Although the polls did not close until six o'clock the result in York-Sunbury was known in little more than an hour.

The election was one of the quietest in the history of this constituency and good feeling prevailed among the party workers at the various polls.

Following is the result of the votes in the two counties:

SALES VALUE OF SHERLOCK HOLMES GREW ENORMOUSLY WITH AMERICAN BOOKMEN

(New York Sun)

The late Conan Doyle received a very large room filled with interesting trophies of an active and interesting life. We talked about detective work and modern detectives, but Sherlock Holmes was not mentioned even once. Doyle made us feel that he was quite manifested in the topic. I found him to be a simple modest chap, yet entertaining. He seemed particularly pleased and happy over the charm and success of Lady Doyle as a hostess.

"He was extremely painstaking in his work, and wrote in copperplate script, as clear as print. When he had finished a manuscript, it was finished. No change or correction had to be made. I still have a page of one of his Sherlock Holmes stories, with marginal notes and interlineations made by him to improve the story and make it complete.

"To my notion the world lost a really great man in the passing of Doyle."

"It was forty one years ago that a country doctor named Doyle, then only 30 years of age, sold to S. S. McClure the American rights to six stories, receiving nine pounds a piece for the tales, or a total of about $270. Mr. McClure had had success already in placing the words of Robert Louis Stevenson and H. Rider Haggard with American papers for serial publication, and he took a chance on Doyle.

"The stories were quite popular, so much so that my cousin has no hesitation in taking the next six at 11 pounds a piece, or a total of about $330. Although, you see, Mr. S. S. McClure paid Doyle just under $600. for the twelve.

Doyle Wearies of Holmes

"Then Doyle wearied of Holmes and Dr. Watson and their ingenious solutions of crime problems—manifested, indeed, an absolute dislike for the character. He ended Holmes' life, we recall, on an Alpine mountainside. Years went by, with the author deaf to numerous and insistent appeals for more Holmes stories—appeals coupled with very tempting offers. Finally, Robert Collier of Collier's Weekly succeeded in breaking down Doyle's resistance, and for a series of twelve, new Sherlock Holmes tales paid the author $50,000 for the American serial rights. These were the twelve grouped under the title "The return of Sherlock Holmes," and to produce which Doyle had had to bring his hero back to life after the world had come to believe him dead.

"Still later I offered him $75,000 for ten more stories, but he refused. Later on I went to England with William J. Burns, the detective, solely with the idea of inducing Doyle to collaborate on a play combining a detective of fact with the greatest detective of fiction. Mr. Doyle listened graciously but made it quite clear that he was through with Holmes for good and all. "It was on this visit that I had the best opportunity to estimate the man's quality. He had just been knighted and was already living at Crowborough, in Sussex. He asked me down to his home over a Sunday. Edward Bowes of the Capitol Theatre was one of the house party and so was Stefansson the explorer. Doyle himself (although this is not generally known) had gone as ship's doctor on a whaling cruise in the arctic.

The Librarian's stories never fail to enliven the family dinner table. She is in charge of the children's department in a branch library. The other night she brought home this one:

A small boy approached her desk with an air of importance and handed her a slip of paper.

"I want some material on these two men," he said.

The Librarian glanced at it, expecting to see Hoover and Coolidge, or Byrd and Lindbergh named. Instead she read in laborious childish printing:
