REAWARDING GENIUS

The Montreal Standard is glad to learn that the newly organized Canadian Authors' Foundation is meeting with success, but apparently has a suspicion that its object is to provide a government dole for needy writers, "whose books are to dull or too high brow for the reading public." The Standard says:—

Professor Pelham Edgar, of the University of Toronto, has returned from a trans-Canada pilgrimage with the glad news that the Canadian Authors' Foundation is meeting with a satisfactory response everywhere. As a private enterprise we wish the Canadian Authors' Foundation every success; but as a sort of Government dole to needy writers whose books are too dull or too high brow for the reading public, we look at it very much askance.

We venture to hope that Professor Edgar has been able to bring together into a corporate body a sufficient number of wealthy Maecenases who will get a back out of patronizing literature in distress without dragging a much harassed Government into the affair.

It would, we submit, be very detrimental to impecunious genius, if it were relieved by the Government in power. In that case Conservative genius might be relieved at once, while Liberal genius would have to wait until the Greek Kalends or when the Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King gets in again.

As we have often said before, we believe that genius should be self-supporting. If genius is too snifty to write what the people want or what the people like, genius should take the consequences and not shift the bill for its martyrdom to the taxpayers.

Time was, we admit, when genius could not take care of itself unless it had inherited money; but that day has gone by and all the big writers nowadays are good business men and can not be cheated by their publishers. And this goes not only for popular writers like Arnold Bennett, and Hall Caine but for the loftier foreheads like Thomas Hardy and Joseph Conrad, all of whom have died rich men within the last few years.

The moral seems to be that a genius may be a genius, even when he is a best seller—like the late William Shakespeare—and there is nothing derogatory in looking after one's royalties, if such are to be had. A genius is no less a genius because he writes for this age—which pays for his books—and not for posterity which reads them when the copyright has expired. When it happens that neither this age, nor posterity cares to read his books we submit that the author is not a genius and should be left to stew in his own juice. No body asked him to write—so it's nobody's business.

We apprehend that the Canadian Authors' Foundation has a wrong idea of genius. The geniuses will probably be selected by a committee of college professors who never typed a line that would hold anybody for a minute and the judgment will be no favor of persons who never wrote anything that anybody cared to remember.

The construction of a trans-Canada highway will, of course, provide a lot of employment, particularly in Ontario and the Western provinces, but is scarcely likely to prove of any great assistance to the railways, which are suffering from motor truck and bus competition, which is the outcome of improved highways.

Balancing government budget might be more easily accomplished if legislators would scrutinize expenditures rather than sources of income.

One by one, sometimes by doubles and wholesale lots, man's pre-emptives are being taken from him by the women. We are reminded of this sad reflection by a story coming from the West which tells of a flapper who, when the gent with whom she was riding got fresh, threw him out of the car and calmly drove home, leaving him to negotiate the distance in the orthodox way devised for the defenseless female.

It's a curious fact that the man who leaves a $2,000 car on the street unlocked wouldn't think of depositing a $20 bill on the curbstone and expecting to find it parked there after an hour's absence.

One reform that will be heartily welcomed by the pedestrian is any suggestion for a movement to make this world a better place in which to live. Or, for the better of that, just a place to live.

Prince Michael of Rumania passed his third grade exams with a general average of 98.7 per cent. Either Michael is a very bright boy or his instructors are shrewd as well as wise.

Speakers at a Glasgow political rally were belabored with sticks and stones and "received slight razor cuts." The Scotch seem to have reduced heckling to a fine art.

Mayor Walker, of New York, who went abroad to recuperate, comes home to get a real rest in a place where he can plan the disposition of his own time.

Frogs, says, a scientific item, live from five to fifteen years. That's bad news for business men who have been hoping for a speedy end of the croaking.

Now they're canning to relieve the unemployed, but that was the cause of the trouble in the first place.

Perhaps misery does like company, but it is better to have but one tooth ache than two.

British fliers are making 400 miles an hour, and still they can't keep ahead of the tax collector.

Effort to introduce pounding the pound as a fall sport is frowned upon in the best financial circles.

The River Rising

The water in the Saint John River has risen quite rapidly during the past few days as the result of rains.

It is now two feet ten inches above the ordinary summer level, according to a record kept at the city pumping station. During the last twenty four hours it has risen four inches.
