WARM RICH SHADES IN VOGUE

Day dress is strongly affected in color by the influence of the French Colonial Exposition. The choice of color is divided into two groups—a number of new rich warm shades together with several brilliant colors and the familiar quiet shades as dark browns, greens and navy. In addition to bright greens, like reds, vivid blue and various yellows, there is a new emphasis on henna and rust, on copperish or reddish browns.

Evening dress is less influenced by the trend toward dark and strong colors, these at the moment being discarded in favor of soft light shades. Contrast continues to be notable in daytime costumes, combinations of importance being porto brown with parakeet green, black and green, black and white, navy with light blue, navy and white, dark and light green, dark brown with powder or flower blue.

A combination much featured by some dressmakers and employed more or less by all is parakeet green with porto brown the former bright, the latter a very dark rich shade. As separate colors these two are most important.

Colonial browns, appearing in wools and silks follow up from reddish browns and lead on to orange and yellow. The whole warm range has a future for late summer and fall especially as all the shades are unusually harmonious one with the other.

This pre-eminence of brown is noted in evening as well as day dress. Tidan and henna shades are particularly wearable and offer something new in the realm of brown. Along with these reddish hues there is considerable use of duller browns from the cinnamon shades to the wood tones.

Cut in triangles and dip each sandwich in a mixture of one egg beaten with one cup of milk. Saute to a delicate brown in a little butter and serve with maple sauce.

According to late magazine ads, it is no longer compulsory to wear a tuxedo in the host's kitchen when admiring the new electric ice box.

A White Plains church holds service for golfers at 8 a.m. but we think that is a serious mistake. Golfers need services more after the game than before.
