

U. S. COUPLE BREED NEW DOGS FOR THE SWISS POLICE, ANIMALS MAKE GOOD RECORDS

New York—High up in the Jura mountains of Switzerland, overlooking beautiful Lake Geneva, two American dogs, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, formerly of Philadelphia, are conducting a training school for German shepherd dogs which is said to supply the police of the canton of Vaud with the best "police" dogs they have ever had. Two of the canton's judges, both of whom have publicly given credit to the dogs for cutting down petty crimes recently described them as the most useful canine citizens in Switzerland. Mr. and Mrs. Eustis are official dog trainers by appointment to the canton's police department.

Tom Hitchcock's Kin Eustis, a cousin of the Thomas Hitchcock of polo fame, had been a dog breeder and trainer of note in America and when he went to Switzerland a few years ago he decided to devote his time to breeding a strain of German shepherd dogs that would embody all of the breed's good traits in and as few of the bad ones as possible.

To this end he bred the excessively strong, hard-working and intelligent shepherds of South Germany with the less intelligent but more beautiful Northern German species, to produce a dog which would combine strength, intelligence and beauty. From the beginning he was successful, and his dogs, according to the experts who visited his kennels, became the equals, if not the superiors, of any German shepherd dogs in the world.

bring out the most of the dog's valuable faculties. The teaching of trailing alone takes months, with man and dog working together, and it was this time, he soon found the trail. Up training which, when completed, made the dogs most valuable. They were lifted to a rank of "specialist" by Maj. Champod, and three or four of them became famous throughout French Switzerland.

Wigger's Good Record

Of these, the most renowned is a dog named Wigger von Blasenberg, one of the first "class" from the Eustis kennels. Last January Judge Marc Collio of Lausanne said publicly that Wigger was the principal reason for that fact that not a single case of burglary or theft had been brought before his court during 1927.

In the previous year Wigger had trailed 20 burglars and been instrumental in convicting them.

In his law enforcement career Wigger and his gendarme partner, Parlier, have worked on more than 40 important cases and have solved 32—which is considered an excellent average. Wigger's record includes work in the solution of suicide cases, prevention of attempted murders, apprehension of escaped lunatics and the tracking down of dozens of robbers. He once, too, found a purse that a wealthy farmer had dropped out of his pocket, digging it out from under a six-inch furrow in a large field after several hours of search.

One of his cleverest jobs, which was reported in the press throughout Switzerland, was the finding of a woman who had disappeared from her home in the Jura mountains in a highly nervous condition. Her family and friends searched for her in vain for three days. Then Wigger was put to work.

Picking up a 70-hour old scent, further obscured by an inch and a half of snow which had fallen in the mean time, he soon found the trail. Up through the mountains he trailed for miles and finally lost the scent in a heavy drift. A thorough search revealed the woman lying unconscious, almost covered with snow, near where Wigger had given up. His sense of smell was said then to have exceeded any ever shown by the keenest bloodhounds.

Three Days on Scent

Once when a man disappeared from his home near Lausanne, Wigger had to work for three days on it. He followed the man's trail around his farm, through the mountains and down to the shores of Lake Geneva. The lake bottom was dragged at the spot where he stopped and the body was found. Apparently the man had planned suicide and had been careful to make a final inspection of every part of his farm.

In almost every large town in the republic, the police are now using dogs, and at night one may see, beside the gendarme, patrolling the streets, a large dog, supplementing, with his keener sense of hearing and smell, the superior intelligence of the man.

STRIKE IS ENDED

(Special to the DAILY MAIL by the British United Press)

London, Feb. 17—The strike of four thousand barge and lighter workers on the Thames ended today and removed a threat to London's food supply. The strike began January 4.

Japan's is believed to be one of the earliest cases of spring fever in medical annals.

NEW CABINET HOSTESS AT WASHINGTON KNOWN FOR WIT

Washington, Feb. 15—Known to inner society of three cities for her beauty and dash, Mrs. Ogden L. Mills—the capital's newest Cabinet hostess—also has a wit that has brought many a smile of pleasure to the face of officials drawing her for a dinner partner.

The elite of Washington, Philadelphia and New York were delighted with the addition of Mrs. Mills to the ranks of Cabinet wives through the elevation of her husband to the Secretaryship of the Treasury.

She maintains her inviolable rule against talking for quotation, but with a gay graciousness disclosed today that to her the new position signifies chiefly a different title on her invitations, longer social lists, and stretched hours for her already hard-working husband.

Wears Long Bob

Mrs. Mills is striking in carriage and voice as well as attire. Of medium height, she wears her brown hair in a long bob, curled up below her ears. Blue-eyed, fair, she has clear patrician features. She wore a closely-fitted black wool skirt and a pale, rose crepe blouse with irregular neckling and diagonal hemstitching.

Once Mrs. Mills went campaigning with her husband, for the Governorship of New York, in 1926. She got enough publicity, she smilingly recalled, to last her for a life-time. It seems that when she told the truth—that though she knows politics from personal contact with it in the making, she is no student of public affairs—she was depicted as the classic home-type.

And for form that is Mrs. Mills. Her first interest is her family, and she keeps close to her husband's career. She was standing near when he and his predecessor, Andrew W. Mellon, new Ambassador of the Court of St. James's, took their oaths; she has used the transatlantic telephone to keep in touch with London.

Reads But No Scholar

But first Mrs. Mills is herself—gay, charming, interested in people and in living. She reads, but disclaims erudition in literature. She plays tennis and golf, but mildly. Music and a bit of recreational social work have a place in her program, but she would tell you modestly and frankly enough she does not emphasize either.

Born to wealth and position, she was one of three daughters of Philip S. P. Randolph of Philadelphia. She was introduced to society there, and last year presented her daughter, the diminutive blonde Dorothy, in New York and Washington. The girl and two sons are children of Mrs. Mills' earlier marriage to John Fell, Philadelphia clubman.

Last winter Miss Fifi Laimbeer married the elder son of Mrs. Mills. The younger son, 12, is in school here.

The Secretary and Mrs. Mills were married in 1924 and since then her time has been divided between Washington and New York. In June they move for the summer to their Long Island estate.

Though she expects the official entertaining the capital rigidly requires of its political leaders' hostesses—she do it with zest and individuality—she new Cabinet lady insists she will remain what she persists is a usual sort of person.
