John Barclay Won't Beg Pardon!

John Barclay won't be sorry to see the feminine wide-brimmed hat fashion go the way of all fashions. Being six feet seven, Barclay finds himself looking down on huge hats unable to tell whether or not he knows the wearer. The other day he walked clear around a wide brim because he thought it belonged to an actress who had played with him in Champagne, Sec'. It happened that he didn't know the lady at all. So he swung on his heel in time to see the doorman at one of the Radio City entrances looking at him with a so-your-that-kind-of-aguy glance.

TALKING TO THE HORSE, NOT TO ANGRY GIRL

(New York Sun)

No mistake about it—they had just a bit of argument, for the charming young lady was walking stiffly, staring straight ahead, paying not the least attention to the wholesome looking young man at her side.

"Don't be a crumb, honey", the young man was saying. "Gee, I did not mean it that way".

Silence—thick, unvarnished silence. "Gosh, babe, don't act that way. Look, the driver of the wagon is laughing at you".

"What driver" she asked spontaneously, turning her gaze to where he was pointing.

"The mug", he said. "The fellow who just pulled his truck to the curb. He was looking at you and I'm sure that I heard him laugh at you. Wait here". (The young man stepped away, but turned back immediately. "My mistake. He was only saying whoa! whoa! to his horse. I'm sorry")

"You—why you—you—oh, what's the use?" smiled the lovely lady as she once again took her young man's arm.
