DIVING IS ALL IN A DAY'S WORK FOR THOSE WHO DIVE, APPARATUS IS IMPROVED

(New York Sun)

Every once in a while a thin paragraph reports that some diver has gone to the bottom of New York Harbor and come back with whatever he was sent for. Nobody pays much attention to the feat. Not much more than, if as much as, folks pay to a flagpole sitter, or a guy who sits in a racket store window smoking five cigars at once. There is proof that even under the NRA justice still gets in its evil licks. For to tell the truth, when a diver goes down bands should play and drums beat a rousing, heroic rub-a-dub-dub. Diving is that dangerous.

Modern apparatus permits any man in the mood to do down 150 feet or more, and stay there for at least an hour. But even with such improvements a twisted air hose still can cut off a diver's oxygen and kill him almost before you can say Jack Robinson, and certainly before you can whirl even an electrically operated winch and yank him to the top.

The risk is present all the time, no matter how well the inventors work. Nevertheless, present also all the time are hardly chance takers who are constantly scheming to go deeper. In Germany one ingenious worker has figured out a two-and-a-half ton device which, he says, will enable him to go down 9,750 feet. Liquid air, he insists, will enable him to breathe when fed into the container properly. Another German has a cylinder of steel in which he is willing to stay at the bottom of 6,500 feet of water for eight days.

At the other extreme is the twelve-year-old tyke out in California who, rigged up an air-tight helmet out of an oil can and walked along the bottom of his father's private swimming pool.

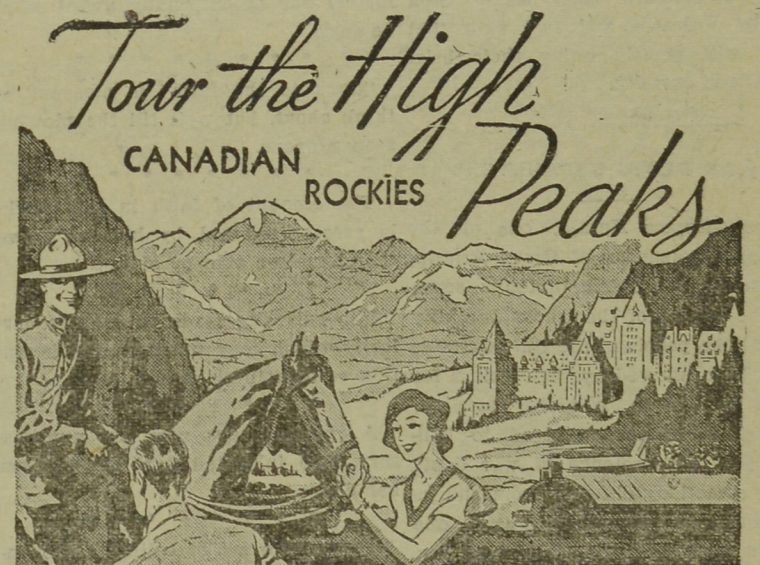

Whether the German deep-sea adventurers would come safely up from the excursions they are so willing to make it pretty much of a question; but the kid in California did; which puts him about a par with the British diver who was stuck for seven hours in Liverpool mud, and the Louisiana underwater huntsman who was trapped forty-two feet down in Lake Pontchartrain and lived to tell about it. And of course, there is William Beebe, the scientist, who has been telling for years now of his sight seeing trips down in the bathosphere.

Man has been diving ever since he learned to swim, which was probably a long way back in the pre-historic age when some six-footer took some five-footer and tossed him angrily into the nearest water. Diving with the aid of artificial devices seems to have got a start about 100 years ago. About that time somebody figured out a rubber suit that failed to leak. It keeps a lot of men at work today, here around New York and all around the world, too. Your veteran on the jobs will insist that it is just so much work, like sweeping the streets, or ploughing farm land. And it is, in a sense, because it is an essential of commerce, and must go on, day in and day out. But it is a hazardous, heroic labor, too, and don't let anybody tell you it isn't worth the $13 a day more or less, that it brings.

SACK OF 2750 DIMES BUYS HIM A NEW TRUCK

Memphis, July 23—Henry Berretta, a Shelby county vegetable grower, went to market today in a truck that was all his, not a payment due. He appeared at a used-car lot here yesterday, gave a salesman a sugar sack filled with 2,750 dimes and drove away in the half-ton truck.
