

QUEENS OF LONG AGO DO NOT ALWAYS SHOW UP WELL IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY SETTINGS

A young actress declared recently "did I not learn in the sixteenth century how to use a perfect blend of risk and caution, in order to become rich? I lent money to other monarchs—yes—but first I got their Crown jewels as security. They called me the Royal pawnbroker, but I did not mind." The telephone on her desk and the interviewer fades out.

Queen Victoria refuses to move forward out of the dignified setting which her personality created. "Tis a mad world," she affirms, in which she has no place.

Do Not Transplant

Some queens, it must be admitted, cannot be taken out of ancient time and place without losing the very essence of personality. The dazzling wealth of the Queen of Sheba belongs to the mythical East; the charm of Cleopatra vanishes when we take her away from the Nile and the background of ancient Egypt. It is otherwise with Theodora, ornament of the Byzantine stage and Roman Empress; she steps with confidence out of the sixth century into the twentieth. She knew what it was to earn her own livelihood as a dancer in the Hippodrome, and proved to be the equal of her husband—the Emperor Justinian—in ability and courage. She it was when Justinian was about to take refuge in flight from an angry mob, reminded him that "the Imperial purple is a glorious shroud."

Queen Margaret of Scotland willingly exchanges then lettered eleventh century for the twentieth. She rubs her eyes at a world full of books and a population indifferent to them. Like a bird she flies into the open door of a University and is at once at home in its spacious library.

Diplomat's Wife Now

Mary Queen of Scots, cannot believe that she is in old Edinburgh until, glancing upward, she sees the frowning Castle rock. That stirs old memories, but they cease to disturb her and she exclaims with delight over the gardens and shops of Princes street, "almost as beautiful as Paris." She says softly, "but I miss the horses and the falcons." Mary is the wife, exquisite and soignée, of the French Ambassador to England. In that sphere she is happy, using her wonderful gifts of fascination and savoir faire. She has a weakness for building artists and musicians and her entourage of pet "lions" is well known in society.

That commanding red-haired lady is her husband's most trusted adviser. He is a financial magnate, but he admits that his wife's "flair" is even more delicate than his own. "And no wonder," laughs the Queen Elizabeth, forcing and scoring systems.

GATE CRASHERS OF BOSTON SOCIETY EVENTS ARE CLOSELY WATCHED BY THE SLEUTHS

(Boston Traveler)

Gate-crashers are now getting the gate at society functions, for Boston society is turning more and more to the use of private detectives to protect themselves from those who try to "chisel in" on garden parties and other summer activities. Not to mention weddings and other such formal affairs.

Targets for Thieves

Recently in Milton a family employed two different agencies to protect them from the activities of a would-be kidnapping gang. Nothing ever came of the threats made, but letters were received and the family quietly met the threats with proper guards.

Weddings are a recognized target for thieves. And many a man, whose broad shoulders make him stand out in dinner clothes, is in reality a detective employed for the purpose of protecting wedding presents. Many a detective has sat in an opera box so the wearer of some real jewels could sit in safety and lower her lorgnette at others in nearby boxes without fearing thieves.

Today a young chap who has been "crashing society" is under surveillance. His background is not such as to cause those in the Blue Book to seek to entertain him but somehow he has crashed in. But he had a mean tongue and made some remarks reflecting on the private morals and financial standing of one or two families. He is being watched although he hasn't the slightest knowledge that a man or two—or even a girl—are keeping an eye on him.

When the right time comes he will be told to keep away, and if he makes any remarks, he'll be jailed, for the detectives have been quietly probing his private life, and it is not entirely as pure as the driven snow.

Keeps His Mouth Shut

Nowadays when garden parties are the usual rule, the committee in general charge—and such affairs are usually run by committees—usually hires an able-bodied chap who mixes with the guests and keeps his mouth shut. He keeps his mouth shut because, if he talked much, some words not usually heard in the upper crust might come out of that mouth.

Some one of the committee usually knows every one who has been invited, and the detectives just watches. But his training is such that he knows what to watch for, and he usually can spot "a wrong guy" long before anyone else notices anything wrong.

There was recently a case of a young man, with nice manners, who appeared at various functions. He said the right things, and his manners were all they should be.

He had been seen at various parties, called people by their names, and started to make love to one of the less popular debbies. What might have happened, no one knows, but a detective looked him over and something made the sleuth think that all was not as it seemed. The detective spoke to the hostess. She had wondered a bit, but she had nothing on which to base her suspicions. The detective began to dig around a bit, and learned the chap was a blackmailer. No prosecution followed, but the black mailer was quietly informed that unless he left this city he would be greatly embarrassed.

Calls Sleuth as Escort

But, in addition to such matters, society people often get into odd scrapes and need the friendly offices of some one they can trust. And the private detective is apt to be quite tactful and discreet. They are all licensed and bonded by the commissioner of public safety and work with the police.

Outdoor Sports Explained

For those who look on sport as something a little more vigorous, there is a listing of the players in lacrosse, the distance between the pitcher's plate and home plate in baseball, and even a discussion of sports writers' terms of "box," "slab" and "the rubber." It tells the width of a hockey goal and how high from the floor baskets are in basketball.

There are 12,000 pictorial supplementary explanations, and every page is 60 per cent changed from the first edition.

President William A. Neilson of Swith College was editor-in-chief.

No one will ever learn the name, but there was a girl who liked to do some high, wide and handsome drinking, and when she was in her cups various things had happened to her. So she decided to protect herself, and whenever a party got a bit hectic she called a detective. The man arrived in evening dress and became her escort. The girl then could drink to her heart's content and be taken home with her jewels, money and reputation—all safe.

Sometimes a quaint call comes to detectives. There was the time when a detective was summoned by a young matron in a hotel. Would the detective please buy her a complete outfit of lingerie and stockings, and a suit? The detective knew her, and promptly did the errand. He guessed at the sizes and guessed accurately enough to enable the woman to make her way to a taxicab and thence home without attracting too much attention. She hadn't a stitch of any of her clothing left in the hotel room.

As to just what happened—well, a detective never asks questions, but in this case the detective sort of surmised a few things. He knew the husband to be a man of intense jealousy, but beyond those two facts he knew nothing, and merely smiled when asked what had happened.

College Girls Protected

College girls are often protected without their knowing anything about it. A girl from the West arrived in Boston and, with two other girls, took a furnished suite in the Black Bay. The place looked quite all right. The girl's family wanted to make sure and asked for a routine investigation by a local agency. The agency looked into it. The girls were on the second floor. The first floor was occupied by a bootlegger. The third floor was occupied by a woman of bad repute, and a dealer in narcotics occupied the top floor.

The girls had signed a lease. The detectives sought the owner and, after a little "persuasion" were able to convince the man that he should not attempt to hold the girls to the lease. The school was notified and that particular house went on the school blacklist. Detectives who act as "chaperones" are not uncommon. Graduation "fatherings" usually call for the right type of escorts and such are furnished. In general they act "in loco parentis" as the law so quaintly puts it, and they know their way around town, too. To them it's all in a day's work.

THREE RED MEN GET THE DEATH PENALTY

Vernon, B.C., July 3—Richardson, Eneas and Alex George, Indian brothers from the Canford reserve near Merritt, B.C., were under sentence of death today for the murder of F. H. Gisbourne Dominion Indian Department constable.

The brothers were found guilty by an assize court jury here Saturday night and sentenced by Mr. Justice Denis Murphy to hang Oct 26 at Okalla jail, where they will be confined until the day of the execution.

Gisbourne and Percy Carr, provincial constable, visited the reserve on the night of May 23 to arrest Eneas in connection with the stabbing of his wife. Next day, Gisbourne's blood-stained car was found on the banks of the Nicola River not far from the reserve, and the constables were missing.

Testimony at the trial showed the men had been slain when they attempted to apprehend Eneas and their bodies thrown into the river. That of Gisbourne was recovered from the River May 26, but Carr's body has not been found.

Joseph George, fourth brother, also accused of the murder, was unable to appear for trial owing to deafness, the result of head injuries police allege were suffered in the fight with the two slain constables. Joseph is under medical care in Vancouver and there has been no announcement as to what action will be taken in his case.

MONTREAL PAPER PRAISES THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Bennett celebrates his sixty-fourth birthday today.

The people of Canada irrespective of party affiliations—which are becoming less binding each year—will unite in wishing him most heartily a long life, lasting happiness and very many happy returns of the day.

Being called to the Premiership at one of the most difficult moments in history and facing from the first a succession of trying problems and even desperate dilemmas, he has astonished not only his fellow countrymen but observers beyond our borders by his courage, his steady optimism and his firm refusal to be stampeded along lines that seemed to offer easy escape but which lead to treacherous quicksands and final disaster.

This is no time to review his record. Although many of us feel that his government failed to act with sufficient vigor on some important matters, such as the railway deadlock that is driving the nation into bankruptcy, we can all agree that the Prime Minister is a model of perobity, thoroughly patriotic and unswervingly loyal. Those who are impatient with lack of progress in some directions do not know of the obstacles in his path and the difficulties must be overcome.

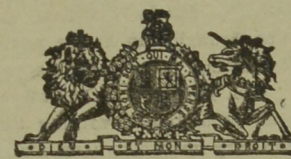

We still have Parliamentary government in this country. The politicians must be convinced and inspired, no mean task—as we realise when we note the cowardly manner in which they ran joyously away from even the beginnings of railway amalgamation which the railway executives themselves were unanimously willing to set on foot.

It may be irrelevant but only fair to add that the Liberals have no railway policy, except that of sniping. In a case of this sort a critic is bound to present an acceptable alternative.

The C.C.F. we take it, have an alternative. They propose to extend the blessings of public ownership, already costing us a hundred millions a year, to our privately owned system.

But as Parliament rises after fruitful session—a session that will bring real relief to the farmer and new work to the cities—we can unitedly congratulate ourselves on having at our head a man who does not have to learn finance from bankers, who has forgotten so completely that he is a party leader that "the baser sort" in even his own party complain, who is regarded as a splendid representative man by our neighbors to the south and our brothers in the British Isles, in whose complete devotion to the interests of the Dominion all our people have the most unquestioning faith.
