(3) The Interior of the Aqueduct.

THE Bassano Dam is the most important engineering work in the Eastern Section of the Canadian Pacific Irrigation Block, but it is not the only important feature by any means. Next to it in importance comes the Brooks Aqueduct. The main irrigation canal, which is fed from the lake created by the Bassano Dam, runs in an easterly direction for about five miles and then divides into two branches, one going north and the other east. The east branch, after having filled several smaller branches, discharges the bulk of its water into the Lake Newell reservoir which has been artificially formed in a depression in the hills, is nine miles long by four wide, has a storage capacity of over 50,000,000,000 gallons, and is designed to be filled during the non-invisiting accessed. pacity of over 50.000,000,000 gallons, and is designed to be filled during the non-irrigating season. Just east of the Lake Newell reservoir is a deep valley about 2 miles wide and it is for the purpose of crossing it that the Brooks Aqueduct was constructed consisting of a reinforced concrete flume 10.480 feet long with a curved cross section some 23 feet wide at the top and nearly 9 feet deep from full-flow water level at the top to the centre of the curve at bottom. It has a discharge capacity of 900 cubic feet per second, the eastern end being 4.85 feet lower than the western so as to create a grade for the water flow, and it carries water for ern so as to create a grade for the water flow, and it carries water for the irrigation of 125,000 acres situated in the Bantry Hills. The flume, the walls of which are five inches thick, is suspended between horizontal girders, the whole supported by a reinforced concrete trestle made up of two lines of columns with a maximum height of 60 feet, but lower in places according to the contour of the valley. About three miles east of the town of Brooks, Alberta, the line of the aqueduct is crossed by the Can-
