U. S. FISHERMEN HAD STIFF FIGHT WITH BIG SHARK

Party Angling For Tuna Off N. S. Coast Had a Thrilling Experience.

Yarmouth, N. S., Aug. 20—Wilfred Koritem, Yarmouth South; Jeffrey Thibeau, Wedgeport; Lewis B. Schwartz, New York; Max Epstein, Samuel I. Harper and Isaac Alpert, all of New Haven, Conn., are telling today of a thrilling experience they had with a huge shark while tuna fishing in Lobster Bay about 20 miles from here. They realize the narrow escape they had from serious or fatal injury, in a fight with a monster which after being landed measured 10 feet in length and weighed over 1,000 pounds.

Koritem and Thibeau left Wedgeport to do some tuna fishing and after cruising about Lobster Bay for some minutes observed the shark apparently devouring the head of a tuna. Making their boat they succeeded in getting very close to the big fish, when Koritem, in the bow, watched an opportunity to throw a harpoon into the shark, which he did, and instantly a battle royal started.

The shark thrashed the water with all its great strength and the next minute turning on its back made a terrific savage attack and with its teeth bit at the side of the boat, and as it backed away stripped a long sliver of the planking from the side of the craft. This it did three or four times and on each occasion struck the craft with great force and as it backed away took an extra streak from the planking. The situation in which Koritem and Thibeau found themselves was not a pleasant one. Fortunately another boat from Wedgeport was close at hand. In it were Schwartz, Epstein, Halper and Alpert.

They hastened to the assistance of Koritem and Thibeau. A rifle was in the boat and a well directed shot by one of the men struck well into the head of the big fish and stunned it, but by no means killed it. The men in the two boats finally succeeded in getting a line about it and got aboard of Koritem's boat, but owing to the spasmodic thrashing of the shark it required the combined efforts of the seven men to land it, and even it was not killed outright until it had been hacked with a hatchet. The struggle lasted for over an hour and both Koritem and Thibeau felt quite a relief when they saw the fish over the side of their boat and dead.
