

VISITORS VIEW BURNED RUINS IN GREAT AWE

City Visitors Awestruck by Extent of Capital Fire Damage—Investigation and the Appraisal of Losses Being Continued.

The investigation into Fredericton's recent $250,000 fire catastrophe, is still going on, and will take up several more days, according to H. H. McLellan, provincial fire marshal, who has been here since the fire, conducting the investigation. The inquiry meeting which took place in the City Hall yesterday and at which the various owners and holders of the burned premises were present, resulted in no unusual evidence. The opinion of the fire marshal is that the fire was from ordinary causes, and there is no reason to believe otherwise.

Still Busy

The fire adjusters from St. John, Moncton, Woodstock and Montreal, are very busily engaged appraising the value of the damage and they will be here for several more days.

Gaze at Ruins

The ruins of the fire are a source of awe to a number of outsiders, who arrived in the city today to view the results of the gigantic blaze of Tuesday, the biggest fire loss in the history of the city of Fredericton. The farmers and visitors who arrived in the city this morning were amazed to see the extent of the damage. Such a fire happens only once in very long intervals.

Still Smoking

Although four days have elapsed since the Queen Street fire, smoke was issuing this morning from the ruins of the building where the flames originated and water had to be turned on it. The insurance adjusters are at work appraising losses

The region in the northern confines of the province in the vicinity of Caraque has become notorious for its numerous game and liquor violations during past couple of weeks.
