CRIME IN THE U. S.

President Hoover's first public address following his inauguration was delivered recently at the annual luncheon of the Associated Press at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel, when he made an earnest appeal for the upholding and enforcement of all laws. In crisp sentences the president painted a graphic picture of the extent of murder, robbery, burglary, forgery and embezzlement in the Great Republic and contrasted crime statistics with those of other countries, particularly Great Britain. He took occasion to point out that there were nine thousand murders committed annually in the United States and less than one sixth of the perpetrators are convicted of the crime. This record, he pointed out, was six times that of Great Britain in proportion to the population. He also pointed out that at least fifty times as many robberies are committed in the United States as in the case in Great Britain and three times as many burglaries. "Even in such premeditated crimes as embezzlement and forgery," he went on, "our records stand in no comparison with other nations."

The president's speech was undoubtedly a strong indictment against those whose duty it is to administer the law in the United States and he intimated that there was much need of thorough reorganization of the law enforcement machinery. In urging this reform and appealing to the press for support he no doubt had in mind a statement made not so long ago by one of his predecessors in office, Ex-President W. H. Taft, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who declared that "the administration of criminal justice in the United States is a standing disgrace to civilization." President Hoover, long before assuming the duties of the high office has proved himself to be an able dealer. Nearly one half of his life has been spent outside of the United States and he is therefore well able to make comparisons, especially with Great Britain. He realizes the necessity of bringing about greater respect for the law in his country, and it is to be sincerely hoped that his efforts will be successful. As the melting pot of the world a lot of ignorance and vice from European countries has found its way into the United States during the last fifty years, and law abiding citizens have been compelled to pay the price.

Although the I'm Alone, a Nova Scotia rum running schooner was sent to the bottom by a Yankee coast guard cutter in the Gulf of Mexico it is beginning to look as if her name had been immortalized. A cartoonist depicts three schooners of that name now cruising in the political waters of the old country. They are commanded respectively by Skippers Baldwin, Lloyd George and Ramsay MacDonald. The artist quotes them as saying in chorus: "No sir! I guess I've got no connection with any other vote running schooner in this row; I'm Alone!" No wonder Capt. Randall has decided to enter the movies and quit rum running.

The death of General Sir William D. Otter, who passed away at Toronto yesterday at the advanced age of eighty-five years, will be deeply regretted by old time militiamen throughout Canada. General Otter, served with distinction in the northwest rebellion and also in the South African War. He afterwards served as inspector general, his important duties taking him to all parts of the country. General Otter rendered good service also as the author of several military works.

The announcement is made that Prof. E. D. McPhee, of Toronto University and president of the Maritime Provinces Association of Toronto, and Mr. R. W. E. Burnaby, maritime trade commissioner are to be in Fredericton on Monday, May 13th, to remain all day. While here they will be glad to meet the business men and manufacturers of the city, and others interested in Ontario markets for their products.

It is said that when Capt. Randall, the hero of the I'm Alone disaster entered the dining room of a large hotel during his recent visit to Ottawa the orchestra promptly struck up "Britannia Rules the Waves."

College professor says the cost of higher education is getting out of range of the ordinary boy, and that the average parent has to go into debt to send his son to a university. That's about right. Ask Dad; he owes.

Phillip Snowden says: "A few years ago it took four sheep to clothe a woman; now one silkworm can do it." And the worm doesn't have to violate any union principles to do it, either.

"It is easier," says Frank Irving Fletcher, "to maintain a reputation for silence than to sustain one for conversation." But for some, Frank, it's still easier to maintain one for sustained conversation.

Speaker says there is nothing to the cry that the girls of today are more immoral than the girls of fifty years ago, and it would take a nifty man to suggest that the girls of fifty years ago are immoral.
