FOR 5 OR 6 YEARS.

Diseases and disorders of the heart
CAN BE CURED BY USING
and the nervous system have become frightfully prevalent of late years.
One can scarcely pick up a paper but he will find recorded instances of sudden deaths through heart failure, of prominent men and women unable to prosecute their ordinary business or profession on account of a breaking down of the nervous system.

We do not desire to unnecessarily alarm anyone, but to sound a warning.
When the heart begins to beat irregularly, palpitations and throbs, has shooting pains through it, it is time to stop and

To all sufferers from heart and nerve troubles Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills can give prompt and permanent relief.

Mrs. Frank Arsenault, Newcastle, N. B., writes: "I had awful attacks of heart trouble for the past five or six years, and as I had tried many kinds of medicine without getting any better I decided to give Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills a trial, and to my surprise I found ease from the second dose. I continued taking them until I had used six boxes, and now I feel as well as can be."

"At the present time my sister is using them for nervousness, and finds great comfort by their use."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c., or three boxes for $1.25, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

The Dog Star

—BY—
Coralie Stanton
and Heath Hosken

The British Iruwe Rubber Company was ostensibly an English enterprise, with registered offices in London, but the moving spirit of it had been a certain Walmer Digby, an Englishman domiciled in Amsterdam, and carrying on the business of a West African trader in that city. The other shareholders were more or less obscure people, who wanted large dividends, and did not particularly care how they were earned.

It was not long before the Lobanzo Company discovered that a canker existed in their midst, a veritable plague spot. The enormous productivity of the B.I.R.C. was exploited with frenzied zeal at the expense of the native population. Its industries were rubber, palm oil, ivory, and a certain tree bark of medicinal qualities that was known as "arborine." It was principally in connection with the rubber industry that terrible stories were circulated about the means that were employed to get the utmost limit of service out of the natives.

It was not until quite recently that Glare Monk and the Lobanzo Company were called upon by the shareholders and the outside public to make any defence. The answer to the charges of Drake and his following had been consistent.

"We have nothing to do with the B.I.R.C.," was what Monk said in effect. "We are as anxious as the most ardent supporter of the Aboriginal Defence League to clear the matter up. We do our best to carry on legitimate trade. We disown the B.I.R.C., and everybody and everything connected with it."

Then came the first shot of the Drake campaign. It took the form of a paper-covered brochure—in a dead black cover, with lettering in red, suggestive of writing in blood:

THE TRUTH ABOUT GLARE MONK

The pamphlet was signed by Valentine Drake, and it boldly charged Glare Monk with being the biggest holder of the B.I.R.C. It printed certain letters purporting to have been written by Sir Glare Monk to the general manager of the B.I.R.C., a certain Van Ost, unquestionably, and it charged him with the B.I.R.C. and the suppression of certain facts, and with a peculiarly bad case of the native women by officials of that company.

Monk's answer to this libellous charge was that the documents were forgeries, and he also gave an unqualified reiteration of his original defence that he had no interest of any kind whatsoever in the B.I.R.C.

Drake's brochure, aroused a veritable whirlwind of impassioned controversy. The country was agitated. Reviews, magazines, journals were full of it. Drake had applied the match of fanaticism to the tinder. A bonfire rare.

The last spark was the novel which sold 50,000 on the day of publication—"The White Man." The author had so thinly disguised his fictional villain that everyone who read the powerful and sensational indictment through the vehicle of popular fiction, saw in the red-headed torturer and insanely inhuman devil-man called "Slayer Bonkum," the noised maker of the Lobanzo and the head of the Blackport commercial house.

Such was the position on this July morning when Monk came into his private office with Lorion, and found a pile of correspondence that one of his clerks was already classifying in order to refer it to Lorion.

Lorion left his chief with a secretary and went to his own office. In half an hour he returned, with all the minor details disposed of, ready to undertake the serious business of the day.

Monk had already finished with his correspondence. He was alone, a little man at an enormous desk, with a calm grey eye and nervous hands fingering a pile of papers and books.

"The scoundrels!" he said, as Lorion entered the room.

"Why?" Drake and his creatures. Look there!" He threw a circular across the table. "Monk, the murderer," stared out of the yellow cover in letters of crimson. "They've sent this to me this morning. No—wait a moment," he added as Lorion was about to take it up. "I want to talk to you first. I've got a heap of things to settle. You see, I didn't go to Moba, after all. You were surprised to see me last night?"

"Very," said Lorion. "It was the last thing I expected."

"But you aren't sorry."

"On the contrary, I'm glad—more glad than I can tell you. Perhaps you understand? This business affects all of us."

"Yes, I think I do understand," said Monk in his quick, incisive manner. "And what was the reason of your return?" asked Lorion, with natural curiosity.

Monk frowned. "We won't bother about that, John," he said. "It was, I need hardly say, a very good and sufficient reason. Don't ask me any questions just now. You'll know everything in time."

Monk's manner and speech were distinctly apologetic. He gave the impression that he felt that he owed his secretary an explanation, which in a man of Monk's character was a most unusual attitude. Monk was not in the habit of apologizing or making explanations.

Before we get on to more serious matters, John, the great man went on, "I'd just like to tell you, as man to man, this sudden change of plans was wholly unpremeditated. I feel I'd like you to know that. When I said goodbye to you yesterday afternoon I had no more idea than you that we'd both be here now."

"But, of course, I quite understand that."

"Then that's all right, because, my dear boy, the last thing in the world I'd like you, or anyone else, to think, is that I'd played a trick like that on anyone. I'll bet you what you like that rag of a Blackport News-sheet will attribute all manner of deep and double-dyed motives to me. However, John, let's leave that for the moment. I haven't gone to Moba. I'm here, and, by George, I'm not in the mood to be trifled with by your Valentine Drakes, or your Mynheer Van Osts, or anyone else. I'm in a fighting mood, John. This is going to be a case of all or nothing."

"By Jove! sir, I like to hear you talk like that," cried Lorion, his cheeks flushing with some of the infectious fire of the elder man. And then he remembered, and his eyes dropped.

"Now about this business of last night, John," Monk went on. "It's very serious, and it's got to be seriously dealt with."

"I quite understand," said the young man, and his voice sounded faint and a little husky. "It is most important, of course. I can't tell you how sorry I am, how very much to blame I feel."

Monk tapped his blotting-pad; his eyes never left the young man.

"I have not blamed you, John," He jerked out the words irritably. "You were the victim of a clever scheme, just as I have been, and am. I trusted you completely. I still trust you. The police, of course, make suggestions, but they are naturally over-suspicious."

"What do the police say?" asked Lorion with ill-disguised anxiety.

"To put it bluntly, John," answered Monk, "they suggest that no one, clever criminal or not, could possibly have got possession of the key of the safe without your connivance. I admit the thing is puzzling, but I haven't a moment's hesitation in saying that I believe you."

"Thank you, sir," murmured Lorion. Monk rose and commenced to pace the room, his hands clasped behind his back. It was a nervous gesture of the little great man.

"It's the most infernally clever thing that's ever happened," he said, speaking more to himself than to Lorion. "I can't help admiring the scoundrel that did it, though it means so much to me. You can't realize, John, what it means. No one can."

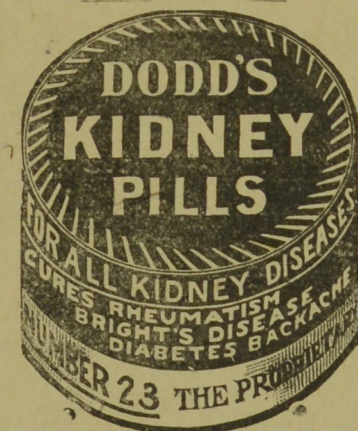

"But, surely, sir," said Lorion, "the loss of these papers cannot be of such tremendous importance as all that. If the letters are forgeries, there must be others in Drake's possession. He must be made to produce them."

But, as he spoke, the words of Lady Monk—"They are not forgeries. Glare is the B.I.R.C."—came to stab his memory.

"The papers are of importance," answered Monk, "of vital importance. There was what they all the secret circular to the overseers, signed by me, or purporting to be signed by me. I gained possession of that with the greatest difficulty. These scoundrels are doing their best to destroy every trace of their forgeries. They've done their worst. It is in England, he and I will meet very soon, if I'm not greatly mistaken."

"So you are in England. Where is he?" asked Lorion eagerly. It was generally supposed that this abandoned trip of the chief to the Lobanzo had for its main object a visit to the general manager of the B.I.R.C.

"No one seems to know," said Monk. "All I can find out is that he landed in Blackport recently and is supposed to be in London. But I don't anticipate much difficulty in finding his whereabouts. And," the little man struck the table fiercely, "I am determined, Lorion, to leave no stone unturned to expose this monstrous conspiracy. I'll find the creatures who
