THAT TICKLING IN THE THROAT

CAN BE QUICKLY CURED BY

DR. WOOD'S
NORWAY PINE SYRUP.

This trouble is most distressing and is caused by a cold settling in the throat. The hard dry cough causes that nasty, tickling, irritating sensation and keeps you from enjoying your night's rest. Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, which is composed of the most soothing and healing expectorant herbs and barks combined with the lung-healing virtues of the world-famed Norway pine tree, will give almost instant relief in all cases of this nature.
Mrs. Alex. Durward, Athelstan, Que., writes: "I have used Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup for a number of years, and find it the only thing that will help me when I have a severe cold. It helps the soreness and stops the tickling sensation in my throat, which is so irritating. I always use it for both myself and the children, and would not be without it in the house."

The thousands of testimonials we have received during the past twenty-five years prove that Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is an excellent remedy for all coughs and colds, so see that you get "Dr. Wood's" when you ask for it.
It is put up in a yellow wrapper, three pine trees the trade mark, price 30c. and 50c., at all dealers.

The Dog Star

what she wanted, and then walked on into another road, and at the corner the gentlemanly stranger, who appeared to have no particular purpose, again bent his footsteps in the same direction as hers.

In this road she found a nice bed-sitting room at a very moderate rent, and a motherly landlady promised to look after her and see to her comfort.
She then made her way up to Pole Street on another tram car, and as she entered the palatial Monk building the gentlemanly stranger hurried up the street as if he had not only an object in his walk but important business to transact.

Later on in the morning he might have been seen hovering about the curio shop in Grange Row.

Vanessa did not see Lorion until after luncheon, when he came into her room before Monk had come back.
She then took the opportunity of telling him of her change of address.

"Well, I can't have you living alone," Lorion said decidedly, and looked into her eyes with a bright light kindling in his own. "This settles it.
We must be married at once."

Lorion quickly silenced all Vanessa's misgivings about their immediate marriage. She was timorous and uncertain, because it was so new to her to be cared for, to be necessary to someone's happiness.

But Lorion was firm, and pleaded so earnestly that she gave way. She must not say another word, but just consent and make him the happiest man on earth, and he would tell Sir Glare, and he was certain that, under the circumstances, her employer would dispense with her services from the following week.

So it was that, on that very night when Monk asked Lorion to come up and dine at Dunbury, the young man arrived there, glad of the opportunity of discussing his plans and hopes with the man to whom he owed so much of the undoubted success that he had made of his life, if not from the point of view of a Lorion, at least from that of the ordinary individual occupying his position.

Lady Monk had left that morning for Neu Reichwuth and the two men were alone. Lorion sat in his usual seat, but it was not until the dessert was on the table that he observed that the portrait of Monk's first wife, in which he had detected the inexplicable strong resemblance to Vanessa, no longer hung on the opposite wall. He was so astonished that he remarked on it.

"The frame has gone to be mended," explained Monk. "One of the maids stupidly chipped a corner off it.
Did you want to confirm your discovery about the likeness to Miss Smith—eh, Lorion?" he added, with a laugh.

Lorion took the opportunity.
"I want to speak to you about Miss Smith," he said. "May I?"

"Certainly, my boy. What is it?"
The servants had left the room.
They were quite alone, yet Lorion found it difficult to begin. He was one of those people who find it very hard to talk about their deeper feelings.

Monk sat rather sideways in his chair; one of his restless hands fidget-ed with the stem of his wine glass.
"I am going to marry Miss Smith," Lorion said suddenly.

Monk's hand entirely covered one side of his face. Before replying, he took up his glass and drained it. His voice was very low; it had lost its jerk tone. His eyes were still fixed on Lorion, who had not let had the fingers trembled.

"Are you, my boy?" he said. His
jerk tone. His eyes were still fixed on Lorion, who had not yet had the courage to look up.

There was a short silence, and then, to Lorion's intense surprise, Monk began to speak hurriedly; in fact, his words came in a torrent, as if he would not give the other a chance to reply.

"I am glad, my boy," he said. "Understand me—I am very glad. It's a good thing, I think. I am very much interested in the girl. She will make you an excellent wife, I am sure. And men ought to marry young. I have always said so. It's a great help, a great comfort. And I shan't forget that you have been of great help and service to me. You can rely on me.
I shan't forget that. And altogether I think it's a very good thing. You understand, don't you? And we needn't discuss it any more, need we?
And I wish you every happiness, and I shall see that your future is assured.
Rely on me."

Lorion was astounded, both at the nervous, almost flurried manner of Monk's speech and at his extremely cordial and favorable reception of the news. He positively glowed with gratitude. "It's awfully good of you," murmured Lorion. He felt confused all of a sudden, though he could not say why. Everything was absolutely satisfactory.

"You want to be married immediately?" asked Monk.

"Next week," he answered.
"Very well. Very well. There's nothing like snatching the golden moment." We must manage a holiday for you."

"Oh, no," said Lorion earnestly. "I don't want it to make any difference to my work. Vanessa thoroughly agrees with me. You have been so good to me. I can't tell you how grateful I am. And I would rather not take a holiday just now."

"Well, we'll see—we'll see," said Monk. His voice sounded rather abstracted.

After that they talked business during the rest of the evening.

The very next morning, before he went to the office, Monk received a visit from Matlock Garth.

"I've come to tell you a thing I'm very chary of telling any of my clients, Sir Glare," said the detective, with an expression of great discouragement on his face. "I've failed in this job; there's no doubt about that. I've altered my tactics since I last saw you, but it's all to no purpose. I can't find out whether Mr. Lorion has those papers, and I can't find out where they are. I've tried every means in my power; I've put my best man on to it; I've worked at it myself. But there's absolutely no result."

"You are absolutely certain that you have tried every means, Mr. Garth?" asked Monk.

"Every means but one. That was what I came to see you about. It's the only thing left, Sir Glare."

"What is that?"

"That you allow me to approach Mr. Lorion and buy the papers from him. He is bound to have his price."

Monk's face was red with anger.
"No, a thousand times no!" he cried excitedly. "I have told you, Garth, I will have none of those bungling methods. Mr. Lorion is not to be approached; he is not to have the faintest inkling of what is going on.
Those are my definite and unalterable instructions."

"Then," said the detective, "I am afraid I must acknowledge myself beaten."

"It must rest there," said Sir Glare.
"You must discontinue your investigations, Garth. Kindly let me know how much I am in your debt. What about the girl?"

"We have had her watched, too," replied the detective. "There is nothing to be learned. She changed her place of abode, which gave us a lot of trouble, but ended in nothing.
She sees no one but Mr. Lorion, and he has not been in her company, outside the office, since Sunday."

"Good! Well, then that is understood, Garth. We must let matters remain as they are for the moment.
I'm sorry to have given you so much trouble for nothing."

As he drove to Pole Street in his motor car, Monk's face was very stern. Into his calm eyes had come a light of ruthless determination. Seeing him then, one understood how he could think of gigantic schemes and carry them out in the face of all obstacles.

So Lorion was going to marry his daughter. It was a scheme of fiendish ingenuity. Lorion knew that the girl was his daughter. Of course he knew it. And he knew that Peter was not his son. So he was going to marry her. Not content with holding her father in the hollow of his hand, he was going to add this further hold to the power that he already wielded.

Had Lorion told the girl the truth?
That was a point that it was impossible to decide. It did not matter much. The girl could be dealt with.
Women could always be dealt with.
But Lorion? He was a man, and, it seemed, a man who could play the cards that he held with unerring skill.
