ECZEMA ON FACE

Was So Bad Had to Stay in House.

All skin diseases such as eczema or salt rheum, itching or burning rashes, eruptions, ulcers, boils, pimples, etc., are all caused by bad blood, and while not usually attended with any fatal results, may sooner or later develop into some serious blood trouble, and the entire system become affected.

Burdock Blood Bitters, that old and well known remedy, will cleanse the blood of all its impurities, and by this means cure all skin diseases and other blood troubles.

Mrs. Ernest Andrews, Hamilton, Ont. writes: "My face was covered with eczema and was so terribly bad I had to stay in the house. I had ten different doctors but got so tired of their treatment that I went and bought a bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters, and it helped me so I kept on taking it. Now I am cured and have a lovely skin."

"People who used to see me when I was so bad and see me now, will not believe it, but I always tell them that nothing cured me but Burdock Blood Bitters."

B. B. B. is manufactured only by The T. McBurn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Won't power is better than will power to break a bad habit.

At first Monk had felt like a man enmeshed in a net. By the time he had reached Pole Street he had made up his mind.

"It's the only way," he said to himself.

His face was more than stern; it was sinister, ruthless. At the same time, it was not revengeful or malicious. It was impersonal. When a fly worries a man he brushes it aside.
Perchance he kills it.

CHAPTER XIII.

"For Men Must Work"

Vanessa Smith's imaginative hero-worship of the great Glare Monk had suffered no disillusion, even though she knew him as a little man with an extraordinarily calm gaze and hands that were never still. Of late he had taken to asking her questions about herself—short, jerky questions as to how she felt, and whether she was satisfied with her past, and whether she found the work congenial. She always answered in the affirmative, and once found the courage to tell him that it was a great pleasure to her to be able to work for him. With that kind of conversation her intercourse with the great man began and ended.

Therefore it was with considerable surprise that she saw him walk into her room that morning and close the door behind him. This was most unusual. He dictated his letters in his own room, and she went back to hers to transcribe them on the typewriter.

But in a moment it was clear to her that he had not come to dictate letters.

"Miss Smith," he said, "I want to have a little talk with you. I can spare a few minutes. It is very important. To begin with, Lorian has told me that you and he are going to be married."

Vanessa flushed. That the great man should take any interest in her personal affairs she felt to be a signal honor.

"He has further told me that you are going to be married immediately," Monk went on. "He mentioned next week."

"You don't want him to?" said the girl in a low voice. "That was what I was afraid of. Oh, Sir Glare, I don't want to do anything that will hinder him in his work. Please believe that. I would rather die than be a drag on him."

By this time Monk had decided that Lorian had not told the girl the truth.
"I am going to be very frank with you, Miss Smith," he said, "because I believe it is for Lorian's good, and yours as well. The news of his immediate marriage has been a great surprise to me. I approve of it most thoroughly. Only I had it in my mind to send Lorian out in charge of an expedition to West Africa. He has been there before, but only in a subordinate position. This would be a big thing for him, great responsibility, enormous experience, and very likely a totally different future from what he could expect at present. You understand me, don't you? It comes to this. If you are married next week I can't send him. If you agree to wait until . . . well, I will send him.
It will make a big difference to him. I am speaking quite plainly to you, because I'm sure you are a very sensible girl. And I am going to leave you to choose."

Vanessa struggled with a mass of conflicting emotions. To begin with, she was taken aback. Then she was both frightened and flattered. And, above all things, she was glad, for Lorian's sake.

"Is it a dreadful climate?" she asked faintly.

"It is not a good climate," he said.
"I'm not going to deceive you. I have had to deal with too many women whose belongings have gone there.
But, on the whole—on the whole, mind you—their fears have been groundless. One always notices the men who die. If you go into the Institute for the Study of Tropical Medicine here, you will see on the walls of one of the laboratories tablets to the memory of men who have died out there. Their work was dangerous, and took them into zones of danger."

"And it will be a good thing for him?" she murmured.

"I have told you; it will make all the difference in the world. I like to try all my men. Those who come out of it well have never had to complain. This is not a school, Miss Smith; it is life."

There was something about his rugged plainness that inspired her. And, despite the cruel choice he was giving her, she thought his eyes looked kind.

A few moments later she realized that she had never been in doubt.
She was filled with the spirit of self-sacrifice. Lorian must have his chance.

"He must go," she whispered; "of course he must go."

Monk did not show any sign. She could not tell whether he appreciated her decision, whether he guessed the pangs it cost her.

"I knew you would be sensible," he said. "Do not fear; all precautions that are humanly possible will be taken. He will have protection, company, the best of stores, medicines—everything will be done to make his journey comfortable and successful.
You may be quite sure, Miss Smith, that as far as it is possible to protect Lorian and make him comfortable, it will be done."

"But I will always be with you," she said.

that," she said, with a quiver in her soft voice.

"I shall look after you," Monk went on hastily, fearing a breakdown, and hating women's tears as much as most men. "I think it will be better, perhaps, if you stay on here and do your work as usual. There is nothing like working, Miss Smith, to make the time pass."

"How long will it be?" she asked.
"Oh, that is difficult to say exactly.
Six months, perhaps; maybe a week or two more; perhaps even less."

"That is not very long," said Vanessa. "If it means so much to him, it is a very short time. Oh, but he will come back? Promise me that he will come back!"

"Of course he will come back," said the man, who was accustomed to be thus prayerfully placed in the position of Providence. "There is no doubt about it. Nerves and drink are the two enemies of the white man in West Africa. Lorian is very temperate, and I'm sure he won't be imagining at every touch and turn that he is ill. He'll come back fit as a fiddle."

"I am afraid you think me very silly, Sir Glare," she said, with a pretty smile of apology.

"On the contrary, I think you particularly sensible," he retorted. "I am glad to find that I was justified in my opinion of you. Now, have you quite made up your mind?"

"Yes," she said in a steady voice.
"If it is for his good, and you say it is, and you know, he must go."

"Well, I shall tell him about it," he said, moving away. "And I shall leave you to persuade him that he must think of the future at the cost of a short separation now. You won't go back on your decision. His voice was curiously eager."

"Oh, yes, you can trust me," she answered in a firm voice, into which the realization of parting had not yet had time to impose its note of despair, "because you say it is for his good. And I would rather die than stand in his way."

CHAPTER XIV.

"And Women Must Weep"

Glare Monk took Lorian out to lunch a few hours later, and in the dining room of the big Railway Hotel, over a frugal meal, he unfolded his scheme to him.

"Don't say anything until you have heard me out, my boy," he said, as Lorian, immediately he understood the proposition, was about to make an impetuous reply.

"And how long should I be away?"
"Much depends on how quickly you get through. I should say, roughly, about six months."

"I can't say at once," said Lorian.
His expression told plainly that there was a fierce conflict raging within him.

"Why not? You were very keen on it when I mentioned it before."

"But the circumstances are changed."

"You are thinking of the girl—of Miss Smith," put in Monk quietly.
"I have spoken to her; she is willing that you should go—"

"What do you mean?" Lorian flushed. For a moment he showed the fierce blood of a long line of proud men.

"Don't be angry, my boy," said Monk. He spoke quietly and distinctly. "I will explain. I spoke to her first, as much for her sake and yours as for my own. I wanted to see what she was made of."

"I must talk it over with her," said Lorian. There was hesitation in his voice.

"One thing, Lorian," said Monk. "I have explained this to Miss Smith.
You must not go out as a married man."

and save yourself needless suffering and unnecessary expense.

For two years Mr. E. E. Gardiner, of Marquis, Sask., suffered with salt rheum. Then he used Zam-Buk and was cured. He writes:—

"I had salt rheum on my feet for two years, and the pain I suffered at times was indescribable. I tried all kinds of so-called remedies, but nothing brought me relief until I used Zam-Buk. After the first few applications I noticed a distinct improvement, and after perseverance, Zam-Buk completely cured me."

Zam-Buk is also unequalled for
