ORDNANCE WORKSHOPS BUSY BEHIND THE LINES

The British battery commander turned to the orderly who sat reading a paper in a corner of the fighting post. "Go and tell my driver to get the car ready," he said. "I'm going to the workshops to see how No 3 gun is getting on. I'll meet him outside the billet in a quarter of an hour."

The major picked up one of his sub-alterns who was off duty and the two stepped into the car together writes Major C. J. C. Street from France. A journey of an hour or so back from the battery position is very welcome to men who are always in position and know nothing of the delights of a withdrawal to the back areas for rest.

"You'll have to go round by Dry Farm," said the major to his driver. "The balloon's up and he'll just spot us if we go the short way."

For half a mile or so their route lay along a by-road, originally constructed to carry nothing heavier than the farm traffic of the district, and now badly cut up by ammunition lorries and hostile shell. After a while the car turned sharply out of the by-road onto a broad thoroughfare, a main artery between two populous towns, and part of a Route Nationale. Here the pace improved and the car sped over the regular pave between two rows of trees that showed very few signs of war. The streams of traffic well-ordered as in a London street, pursued their even way, big motor-lorries with stores and ammunition long processions of horse-drawn vehicles, cheery parties of men with towels over their shoulders marching from their billets to the divisional baths. A shower in the morning had laid the dust and no more peaceful and happy scene could be imagined.

Seven or eight miles of this brought them to the outskirts of a small town where the civil and military elements were strangely mixed. It contained all the various establishments that exist at this distance behind the line, such as headquarters of various kinds, a casualty clearing station, a field cashier and so forth. Its narrow streets were full of British soldiers on foot on horseback and on motorcycles, mixing with the peace-time population now reduced to women, children and old men, with an occasional French soldier on leave. In the marked square a column of lorries was parked; just beyond the car had to draw aside to allow the passage of a heavy siege battery, making its laborious way through the crowded traffic. Perhaps the most striking thing about the place was its sense of remoteness from war. Everyone was going his way about his business contentedly, smiling and laughing in the warmth of the sun.

From here the road lay through a flat and exceedingly fertile land, by the side of a canal. This was typical France, the straight well-paved road, bordered by poplars, the jealously-tilled land, where no single corner was left uncultivated. It seemed a riot of color after the monotonous gray of the trenches, blue fields of chicory mingling with the green of the root crops and the yellowish tints of the corn just beginning to ripen. The canal ran straight as a bar of silver, but for one dark line on its surface where in the distance a busy tug pursued its way, towing a string of barges laden with the supplies of an army corps. There was little traffic on this road, and very soon the church tower, that marked their destination, lay close ahead of them.

Very soon they entered a second town, very like the first, but showing perhaps fewer signs of military occupation. Slowly they traversed its winding streets until they reached an abandoned factory, now filled with machinery sent over from England. This was the ordnance workshop, and here, in an erecting shop that might have been one of those of any engineering works at home, lay No. 3 gun having the finishing touches of a repair job put to it by a couple of typical English mechanics, who looked curiously unfamiliar in khaki instead of their traditional blue overalls.

CHOLERA INFANTUM

Cholera Infantum is one of the fatal ailments of childhood. It is a trouble that comes on suddenly, especially during the summer months and unless prompt action is taken the little one may soon be beyond aid. Baby's Own Tablets are an ideal medicine in warding off this trouble. They regulate the bowels and sweeten the stomach and thus prevent all the dreaded summer complaints. Concerning them Mrs. Fred Rose, South Bay, Ont., says:—"I feel Baby's Own Tablets saved the life of our baby when she had cholera infantum and I would not be without them." The tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.
