LORD KITCHENER.

According to the Toronto Saturday Night, the latest reincarnation of Lord Kitchener that we have heard of is embodied in the statement that he in reality General Foch. Popular superstition is not content to let his bones rest in the green mysterious depths of the seas that wash the northern outposts of Britain. It is not content even with the belief that his soul is marching on. Thousands, perhaps countless legions, hold that his body is imperishable also. The tale that Kitchener is Foch or that Foch is Kitchener is now being whispered breathlessly by men and women in this city, and probably in every city of the English speaking world. It is but a revival of the legend that was common two years or more ago, when Russia was really fighting valiantly and winning victories, that Brussiloff was Kitchener. It is more creditable to his memory than the other version which credited him with being a traitor and the Von Mackensen who was destroying Roumania.

The refusal of a multitude of primitive and confiding minds to accept the grim truth of Kitchener's death, either by sheer mischance or by direct German attack, is perhaps the best proof of the confidence he aroused in the breasts of his fellow countrymen while living. Without that intensely cherished popular belief that all would be well as long as Kitchener was at the helm, it is just possible that the British people could not have been steadied to believe in ultimate victory at a time when the odds were all in favor of an enemy triumph. Without that strengthening belief, that unbreakable moral conviction among the masses of the British people, the greatest volunteer army that the world has ever known, or ever will know, could not have been raised. Though it proved insufficient, the very spirit that inspired it helped to organize the forces of civilization to fight against those who had decreed the death of that civilization.

Kitchener had his infirmities and ineptitudes, but assuredly he did possess the quality which was above all others needful in the crisis that the world was called upon to face—the ability to inspire confidence, to forge the spirit of determination that there would be no surrender so long as the last man of British blood was left alive.

The legend that his personality inspired while he lived, has had its logical development in the refusal of many to regard him as dead; and their pathetic impulse to bring him to life whenever Victory shines on the banner of the Allies; or even when a victory on either side is recorded, is the best proof of their whole-souled faith in him.

Kansas City Times: "What do you do when you are nervous?" Carl Ackerman reports in the Saturday Evening Post was the question put to Von Hindenburg early in the war. "I whistle," was the reply, with the addition that so far he had not been whistling. A London despatch the other day tells of Von Hindenburg's reply to a telegram of anxious citizens of Reichenberg. "I am right as a trivet, and looking calmly to the future." Possibly so; but if the inquirers were about general headquarters, it is believed that they could detect sounds of whistling coming through the keyhole of the field marshal's door.

N. Y. Times: From the American Army in France, now 1,500,000 strong, comes a cautionary message to the American people at home, who are so proud of their soldiers and expect so much of them. It might be put in this form: "With our French and British Allies we, who have just begun to fight, have a long road to travel before victory can be won, and you will best encourage and sustain us, your countrymen, by understanding that victory is not yet in sight because our Allies, with our help, have beaten the enemy back to his old lines and taken many thousands of prisoners and many of his guns."

The cost of a weekly supply of food at the middle of July averaged $13 in some sixty cities as compared with $12.77 for June and $11.62 for July, 1917," says the Labor Department. The monotony with which this monthly report of the increase of food prices is made by the government is enough to give any man an attack of the blues—except a profiteer.

Two currents of opinion in regard to the termination of the war are strongly marked in London. Both run in the same direction, so far as a victorious ending is concerned. Where they differ is in respect to the date at which that desirable consummation can be reached. One of these views sees the war ended next year, the other places the date in 1920.

The Snowball Brigade, for service in Siberia, will mobilize at Victoria, B. C. There will be some New Brunswick boys in the contingent, and their friends should see to it that they are well provided with comforts.

The Kaiser in a recent speech referred to the German High Seas Fleet as "our death-defying nature." It sounds like a phrase a fake showman would use.

THROUGH OUR SIEVE

Friday, the 13th.
 A bad day for someone, no doubt. Germans could change their luck today by surrendering.
 It's reasonably safe now to use your bathing suit as fall underwear.

Many a timid man gives another credit for his own ideas because he isn't quite sure of their merit.

What is it about the sight of a man in uniform that goes right through a girl's heart and buttons up the back?

One gathers from the lean appearance of the cream one gets now that the cows are short of lubricants.

Plans for Germany's next war have been found on a prisoner. The longer this war goes the more obsolete the next will become.

There are Austro-Hungarian artillery on the western front, but they would freely give 75c. apiece to be elsewhere.

Thanks to glucose, the candy makers continue in business and the manners and customs of wooling are not seriously impaired.

Anyone who has a painless method of breaking bad news should communicate with the high officials of the German army.

SLAUGHTER FOR TEUTONS' NAVY READY

Repr. Daniel Inspected a Cordon of Allied Warships Seventy-Eight Miles Long.

(Canadian Press direct wire.)

New York, Sept. 12—Confident prediction that a naval battle between the German sea forces and the allied fleets would result in "a marine slaughter" for the Teutons was made by representative Daniel yesterday on his return to New York today after an inspection of American naval activities abroad.

"The protection that is being afforded merchant vessels and transports is improving by the hour," he asserted. "The U-boat was a peril. Now it is simply an annoyance. Very soon it will be obliterated. We are pretty anxious to get some idea of the reception that has been prepared for the German navy should it happen to come out. We saw the armor plated reception committee from the deck of a destroyer and it was a sight that will live in my memory forever."

"Stretched about the point whence the German fleet must merge was a 78 mile cordon of allied warships—British, French, Italian and American—their men on their toes, stream up and guns ready. It took seven hours to pass this huge flotilla. For us it was the most magnificent spectacle in the world. The crews that man these vessels are waiting, hoping, longing for the fight that I do not think they ever will see."
