THEIR LOVING FRIENDS AND KIND NEIGHBORS

When it Came to Selling the Household Treasures, the Young Couple Prepared for Sacrifice.

(Chicago News.)

When Banners got the wire from his firm to leave at once for the western office of the concern and remain there permanently, there was much weeping and lamentation by young Mrs. Banners, who had as a bride succeeded in making her honeymoon flat a regular newlyweds' dovecote.

"I know it's terrible, dear," said Banners consolingly, when he had broken the news. "Everything is grand and glorious here, and now we've got to leave it."

"It's so far away," cried Mrs. Banners. "Anything west of St. Paul is out of the question. Besides, there are the neighbors and friends we've made here that will kill me to part with," sobbed young Mrs. Banners. "They've been so good and sociable. And this dear apartment! I know we'll never be able to set it up again out there as we have it here. The chairs and glass and everything will be wrecked in the shipping."

"But we are not going to ship it, lovelies," said Banners. "With the war on and everything it can't be done."

GETTING THE TOMATOES TO RIPEN EARLY

Plenty of Water Now Necessary and the New Shoots Should be Promptly Pinched Off.

Some amateurs are already eating home-grown tomatoes. They have been able to get tomatoes almost as early as market gardeners, especially if they grew the same kind—likely the Bonny Best or Comet. These are not large tomatoes, but have a good shape and color and excellent flavor.

From now on the tomatoes will be greatly benefited by the use of water, provided you give them enough, which means a good soaking at least once a week. An even supply of water all the season will help to prevent most tomato troubles. Make a little depression around each plant to hold the water, or sink a tomato can into the ground at the base of each plant.

If water is hard to provide, you can use a mulch instead. The result may not be quite as satisfactory, but it will go far towards keeping the ground cool and the moisture locked into it. You can use lawn clippings or cow manure. Lawn clippings are preferable, because they help to keep the fruit clean and sound when no supports are used.

Tomatoes like considerable plant food, but if an excess is given early in the season a tremendous growth of foliage will be produced at the expense of the fruit. From now on, though, any fertilizer applied will result in larger and better tomatoes. Liquid manure, especially if made from cow manure, is excellent.

If possible, buy a little nitrate of soda. You can use a teaspoonful at the base of each plant, and the give a good application of water, so that it will be quickly dissolved, or you can mix it up with water at the rate of a handful to six gallons. Don't let the fertilizer strike the leaves, either in dry or liquid form.

Oftentimes you can get ripe tomatoes quicker by removing them from the vines after they begin to turn color than by leaving them on the plants. If tomatoes are put under glass in a sunny place they ripen very quickly, though perhaps the flavor may not be quite so good as in tomatoes ripened on the vines.

If your tomato plants are trained to stakes, keep the new shoots pinched off. They make the plant too bushy if not removed. You can take some of the leaves off near the lower part of the plants if they are very abundant, but don't overdo this. Some cut off a quarter of each leaf instead.

You will find it best to keep the vines off the earth in any event, even if you simply make a low frame of boards and set it around each plant.

Along with the wonderful friends we have made and neighbors we have met we'll have to say good-by to our beloved furniture also."

"Arthur!" gasped young Mrs. Banners, bringing her head to rest on the shoulder of her husband. "The rug grandma gave me and the dining room set and the parlor suite and—the wedding presents?"

"Everything, poor little girl! A fond adieu to everything we have on these premises, but the clothes on our backs. When we reach our new home we'll buy and fit up a new flat! You know how we did enjoy it here."

"I'll put a sign in the window and pass the news to our friends and the neighbors that we are selling our furniture. The neighbors will come in droves and—"

"How wonderful you are for brilliant ideas!" exclaimed young Mrs. Banners in ecstasy. "And we can take all the money and buy a complete duplicate of this cozy flat without a cent of loss."

"My dear girl," said Banners, "you are not only young and beautiful, but innocent and untutored in the ways of the world. What you don't know about friends and neighbors is a good deal. When we offer our $700 piano for sale our dearest neighbor will offer us 25 bucks for it—with the lamp thrown in."

"Grandma's rug, that cost her a modest fortune in her day, will bring an offer of $1.50 from the very man I sat up with when he thought he was about to pass away. Some more of our beloved friends will offer to take the parlor suite and the dining room set and the library table gratis if we'll pay the cartage. The wedding presents we'll get white elephant sale prices for if—"

"John, dear," interrupted Mrs. Banners, "did you say we are going to Seattle or San Francisco? Oh, I'm so glad."
