

Confessions of an Every-Day Wife

By Idah McGlone Gibson

AN EDITORIAL FOR ME.

Theo read the caption again: "What Does the Zoo Mean to You?" and then started the editorial itself. It read:

"You and every other man, women and child in your city own part of the Zoo. It is with your money it was purchased; it is with your money it is kept up. Yet how many times do you, Mr. Business Man, and you, Mrs. Society Woman, go to the Zoo during the year? 'The children go,' you answer, as you start for the matinee or the Dansant, never thinking that the primitive joy of the Zoo holds more real pleasure than the most sophisticated of modern amusements. At least once a week every man and woman would be the better for getting back to Nature's heart; for communing with the trees, the grass, the flowers; for laughing at the antics of the furred and feathered comedians; for realizing that the most wonderful music in the world is the joyous laughter of little children at play in the open. Unless the man and woman of today can go back to the spontaneous and simple delights of childhood for an hour or two occasionally, that man or woman has lost the real capacity of living to its fullest extent.

"When the feel of a soft, furry animal fluff in your arms gives you no thrill; when the comical efforts of the ugliest water fowl trying to gobble the food you carelessly throw it provokes no smile; when the golden sunshine of out of doors does not go to your head like wine; when you cannot dismiss the abstruse problems of the world's business or the modern ideas of the world's pleasures and get out beyond where you become a part of Nature's great plan; when you cannot idly lull your brain to sleep and only indulge your five senses primitively as does the child, without grafting on them the grossness that sophistication brings, you are lost indeed."

"Is it possible that there is another man in this world who has had the same experience that my playmate had the other afternoon?" I asked myself. Then I remembered that on the sleeve of his soldier's overcoat, which he slipped on as he left the store to put me in my car, was the green band with the letter "C," the insignia of a war correspondent. When I talked with him it didn't occur to me that his rank had been anything as peaceful as this, as he also wore the red ribbon of the Legion D'honneur, but now I realized that there were a number of newspaper correspondents who had received this honor and at least one who had received the Croix de Guerre.

I knew the man who wrote that editorial was the man who was able to play as simply as a child, and I was almost sure that he was my playmate of the other day.

"The old fellow's right at that, I guess," said Theo, glancing over the editorial again. "We'll go out to the Zoo a lot, Margot."

"All right," I said heartily, and I felt ashamed of my petti-

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

The London road is the King's Highway,
Traffic forever by night and day.
Up and down, upon foot and horse,
Soldier and sailor and men of the Force;
Carriage and motor, and gypsy van,
Tight-hearted children and touring man,
Down from the ages through years to be,
Many the journeys from land to sea.
Homeless men on the King's highway,
Tired and draggled, and hopeless, they,
Wearily tramping to Portsmouth Town
Over the last long slopes of Down;
Traveller's joy upon either hand,
Mocks their plight in a pleasant land,
And the long hot road, first sand, then chalk,
Echoes the steps of their dreary walk.
I fancy the blackbirds and thrushes sing
Of fallow and farmstead and sundried ling;
Of the stonechat's chink, and the plover's cry,
And the little clouds in a blue, blue sky;
Of commons and hills and the harbor boats—
And ever anon, to their cheerful notes,
The soldiers march, and the children play
And the tramps drag over the King's highway.
—Country Life.

ness in being provoked because I saw Theo driving in the park with his office girl, when I had spent that whole glorious afternoon in the park with the playmate who I was sure had written this editorial.

Why should wedded lovers lessen their regard for each other by making it only a feeling of possession?

In his heart of hearts Theo feels that I belong to him. I may be perhaps the greatest of his possessions, like the largest agate in a collection of marbles, but I am nevertheless catalogued in his mind as something he owns.

When anything comes up like seeing a strange girl in Theo's motor I have the same feeling; one of unreasoning possession and blind jealousy. But in my calmer moments I know that the bond between husband and wife should be composed of sympathy, toleration, understanding, equality and love, which would do away with the idea of possession on the part of the man and bondage on the part of the woman.

"Isn't that your father, Margot?" asked Theo as a motor came up the drive.

"Why, so it is; I'm so glad he's able to get out. I wonder if Letty's bringing him out here to dinner for a change?"

"I heard Budge tell Dad today that your father is getting better very fast and that he will probably be back in his office before long. I must say he looks pretty fit for a sick man now. But that wife of his, Margot, would call a man back from the dead. I don't remember her at all in burlesque."

MATCHES AND CHILDREN

"Another death due to carelessness is recorded in the Runymede district, and this time, it is matches which were the cause. Little Annie Nowiski, aged six years, while playing with matches, lighting them and burning straws on the kitchen floor, set fire to her dress, then ran upstairs and hid in bed fearing her father would give her a spanking. By the time she got under the bed clothes she was in flames and set fire to the clothes and mattress, causing such a volume of smoke that she was suffocated."—Regina eLader.

Children will play with matches when given the opportunity. Fire has a fascination for them. They know not the dangers.
