NO SUCH WORD AS HANDI-CAP IN HIS VOCABULARY

This Man Lost an Arm and a Leg When Eighteen Months Old—Can Drive a Car and Run a Typewriter—Does Much to Encourage Soldiers Who Have Been Crippled in the War—Tries in Every Way to Assist Them.

Tacoma, July 12—"Be a sport. Play the game and the rest is easy. There isn't any such word as 'handicap' in my vocabulary."

That is the way one lad who has gone through life without an arm and a leg brings hope and cheer to the soldier boys who paid the cost of war with their own bodies. He is Martin DeVries of the Red Cross, chum, pal confidant and friend of every patient in the base hospital at Camp Lewis.
He knows what it is to "play the game" without both arm and a leg.
Yet he finds the game well worth playing and refuses to see that he is in any way handicapped or afflicted.
"Didn't even stunt my growth," he laughed as he drew himself up to his full six feet of vigorous manhood.

Drives Own Car

Seeing is believing and anyone who sees DeVries driving a car tramping jauntily down the miles of runways of the hospital, pounding out fifty words a minute with his left hand on the typewriter, knows that the fact that he lost his right arm and his right leg when he was run over by a train when but 18 months old is no handicap to him. He can play ball, he can shoot, fish, ride a horse and drive a motor car as well or better than most men. He worked his way for two years through college and expects to work it the rest of the way when the Red Cross can spare him from his duties at the camp to go back once more to his own ambitions.

In fact, Martin can do the things that the ordinary mortal can do so well that when war broke out and his college friends, first one after another enlisted, donned uniform and hurried away to the training camps, Martin could scarcely endure being left behind. He just had to get into it. So he wrote to Secretary Baker begging him to be allowed to enlist in some capacity. He received a personal letter commending his patriotism and spirit of services, but refusing his services.
Congressmen, officials in many capacities, were all obdurate to his appeals.
But that was because they did not know Martin. At last the army Y. M.
C. A. seeing the rare qualities of the lad who leaped obstacles so nimbly and with such splendid spirit, took him into its service, and within a short time the Red Cross, discovering the depth of affection with which the boys, particularly those who had been maimed, clung to him, talked out the problems that they would not confide to anyone else, and drew strength from his optimism and sunny spirit, requisitioned him.

Plays Ball, Rides

"One of the fellows who lost a leg said when he went in he went like a good sport and now that he'd lost he intended to go on playing the game," said DeVries as he told of his work among the boys. "I try to encourage that spirit among them, and I guess it does cheer some of the fellows a bit when they see I can play ball, ride a horse, hunt or do most anything. Perhaps they talk things over a little more with me than they would otherwise because they know I've been through it, too."

"You see, a thing like this," touching his empty sleeve, "isn't an afflic-tion or a handicap unless you allow it to be, I don't find it so, and they don't need to either."
Six feet tall, vigorous, muscular and energetic, DeVries is tireless as he hurries here and there among the wards, taking new phonograph records to replace those that have grown tiresome, replacing magazines bringing a cheery word to this bedridden sufferer and writing a letter home for that one.

As far as making a living is concerned that doesn't bother him a bit. With only his optimism and his good left hand he went to college for two years paid all his own expenses at the Montana State School at Bozeman, where he had gone from his mountain home near Red Lodge. When his long-awaited call came to do his bit in the army work he had just $25 to get to the Coast.

When I had bought my ticket, which didn't allow for sleeper or dining car meals or any such luxury I had just 20 cents," he laughingly related. "I sat up all the way and I didn't eat till after I got there. But I was coming—that was all there was to it. I came."

This fall he expects to enter Stanford University in quite the same fashion with which he has so successfully been paying his way in the past.

"Be a sport," says Martin. "Play the game and the rest is easy. What's an arm or a leg, or both. There isn't any such word as handicap."

The doctors had no hope of my

I began to mend almost at once;
