POLITICAL LEADERS PAY TRIBUTE TO SIR WILFRID

Debate on the Address Began in the House Yesterday—Acting Premier White Refers to the Great Loss Sustained by Canada in the Death of the Old Chieftain—D. D. MacKenzie and Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux Speak on Behalf of the Opposition.

(Special to The Telegraph)

Ottawa, Feb. 25—The vacant chair of the departed leader on which rested a great laurel wreath, the desk before it crowned with a garden of violets the feeling and eloquent panegyrics of the leaders in the commons, the fervent and impassionate eulogy of Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, the poignant reminder through a somewhat listless opening of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne of the vanished hand and the stilled voice, the spoken word of the new man at the helm and the contrast with the old expectancy when Sir Wilfrid rose to strike the keynote at the opening of the session, an unaccustomed minor key. They emphasized too the great gap left by the passing of the old chief.

The tribute of Sir Thomas White was a noble one, apt in its summing up of Sir Wilfrid's totality of excellencies generous in its appreciation of his high ideals and unsullied life, and eloquent in its concluding references to this great gentleman, said D. D. MacKenzie, standing in his place beside the vacant desk—and speaking simply and with manifest feeling.

"His place can never be filled to-day," he went on to say. "The seat is empty, the home is empty, and empty are the hearts of the people he loved."

Acting Premier's Tribute

Sir Thomas White, the acting premier, the first speaker of the day, said the death of Sir Wilfrid had removed a most distinguished and commanding personality from the stage of public life.

"During his long career," said Sir Thomas, he had been identified with cal system and the security and guarantees for liberty which it embodies and affords. He was a great constitutionalist, an ardent upholder of principles of free government, with all that it involves. It seems to me at times that in his character of constitutionalist and his continued interest in the constitution he was the dignified and solitary survivor of that great group of statesmen, giants in their days who after prolonged and fiery discussion and controversy laid broad and deep the constitutional foundation of Canada's national life.

New Liberal Leader

D. D. MacKenzie, replying on behalf of the opposition, said that speaking for the Liberals and also for the personal friends of the dead statesmen he wished to thank Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That tribute had been he said, so complete that he felt there was little to be added.

Standing by the chair of the dead leader, Mr. MacKenzie said he felt that it could never be filled again. The leadership of the party would be filled but the present Canada could not produce a man who was as capable of taking the place which Sir Wilfrid's death had left. His passing had left a vacancy not only in the Liberal party and the House of Commons chamber, but also in the hearts of the people from coast to coast. He was sorry, said Mr. MacKenzie that the duty of paying tribute to the memory of such a national figure should not have fallen upon more capable shoulders than his own. He could not help thinking he said, of the beautiful way in which the departed leader had been wont to speak on occasions somewhat similar to this and it made him long.

"For the touch of the vanished hand And the sound of a voice that is still."

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux followed. The whisper of death, he said, had passed over the house. In the words of the poet.

"The trumpet's silver voice is still. The warbler silent on the hill."

But death was a law and not chastisement. Let it be said to him who from the generation of tomorrow would come to write the biography of Sir Wilfrid that none better than Sir Wilfrid understood this great fact. For a long time Sir Wilfrid had been preparing himself for the passage from life unto death. It was without bitterness and with a smile on his lips that the old fighter went to his grave.

Sir Wilfrid's sentiments, Mr. Lemieux said were essentially Canadian. He loved France which had given him life, England which had given him liberty, but the first place in his heart was always for Canada. He was above all things profoundly Canadian.

Address in Reply

Major D. L. Rodman, in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, expressed his thanks to the government for the honor which had been done to himself and his constituency in selecting him for the important task. He felt, however, that the honor was intended for the soldiers of Canada, and that he had been selected because of his service overseas; therefore he would try in the remarks which he proposed to make to speak to a certain extent from the point of view of the soldiers.

Captain (Dr.) Manion, of Fort William and Rainy River, referred to the fact that it was customary for the seconder of the address to speak in French, and greatly regretted that he could not use that beautiful language. From this he proceeded to express the hope that there would be established in this country a real entente cordiale. It should, he said be the ideal of any man in Canada a remark which aroused the applause from the opposition. Any man he declared who tried to sow discord was neither a true citizen of the dominion nor a lover of his native land.

Captain Manion paid a warm tribute to the memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, he said had always tried to bring about harmony in Canada. He mentioned that he had been for many years a friend and a follower of his.

At this evening's sitting D. D. Mac-
