They have been very hard to control with fences; a pole fence they can climb and a woven wire fence they will go under or through if there is a strand broken or any holes caused by the unevenness of the ground.

The mohair taken off did not find a market at all until this season when it was sold for a United States mill at

Thus far the effort has been to in crease the flock and none have been used for meat. A few have been sold for breeding; but most of the young bucks have been castered and kept for

On account of difficulty of fencing no detailed experiments on certain areas have been conducted, but these will be undertaken. At present it can be said that a flock of from twelve to seventeen goats have, in two years pretty well killed out the bushes on between four and five acres near where they stayed at night, and they did more or less work over an area of ninety acres. Birch, maple, poplar and cherry were the bushes stripped. Alders were not eaten; neither were coniferous trees.

From experience thus far at this sta tion there is some hesitation about recommending these goats as profita expense of fencing and the great damble stock. The main difficulty is the age they can do to fruit and ornamental trees and shrubs when they get out of bounds. They are efficient bush destroyers and where the fenc ing problem is not difficult the experience here shows they can be used to advantage.

the knowledge of Edith's matrimonia entanglement very peacefully.

"By the way, 'Edith' wasn't her real name, but merely the faddist's name for her. He had caled her 'Edith' during his first spell of delirium in the hospital and had kept it up ever since. And she said that she often felt as if it were really her name. "Well, he told her presently of another unusual thing that had happened to him while under ether. He called it an 'initiation.' An important part of it an 'initiation.' An important part of twas that he seemed to be shown 281 Queen St., FREDERICTON, N. Once she was his mother, and once she was a princess and he was her page. "And the last one, preceding the present incarnation, contained a tragedy. Edith was the wife of another man-and this time 'Edith' was actually her name! And her husband was the same ego, a prior incarnation of the chaplain. The faddist said to me. "Doctor, we were given a repetition of the same test, but under more painful conditions, and that is how the law works. The previous time we failed, for I persuaded Edith to let me carry her off. It was in the lawless old days of stage coaches. Her husband followed us. We fought with swords and I killed him He was a good man, too. I have to pay for that life yet. We have to pay for everything, and thus we learn and grow. It's all perfectly mathematical, not in a static way but in a fluid way that is infinately adaptable to human 'free will.'

"You see he took those ether dreams seriously, and so did Edith. And the conclusion they came to was that they belong to each other but that their business in this particular life was to atone for the wrong of the past by renouncing their own happiness for that of the worthy chaplain. Edith sincerely loved her husband with a filial sort of love and the excellent man has an admirable wife'
