LLOYD GEORGE DEFIES THE EARL OF OXFORD AND ASQUITH TO DRIVE HIM FROM THE PARTY

London, June 10 — David Lloyd George, in a fighting speech at the Manchester Reform Club luncheon made it perfectly clear that he had no intention of being drummed out of the Liberal party by the Earl of Oxford and Asquith.

"I can no longer have the privilege of being a Liberal 'shadow,'" he said, sarcastically, referring to Lord Oxford's bull of ex-communication banishing him henceforth from the deliberations of the so-called Liberal "shadow Cabinet." "I have been driven out into the sunlight—not a bad thing—but I have no intention to accept my dismissal from the Liberal party. I cannot be driven from the Liberal platform. I see no sign of my being driven from the leadership of the party in the House of Commons."

Asquithian Renewal Charge.

While Mr. Lloyd George was breathing defiance, W. R. M. Pringle, prominent Asquithian Liberal, renewed his accusation that during the general strike Mr. Lloyd George intrigued to join the Labor Party. According to Mr. Pringle, Mr. Lloyd George proposed that in return for being given a place in the next Labor government, he was to place at the disposal of the Laborites his political funds to replenish the trade union coffers exhausted by the strain of the general strike.

Mr. Lloyd George, declaring that he had received no square deal from Asquithians, demanded that, if there must be a split in the Liberal party, "let it be a real quarrel, not a rotten quibble." One of the most effective bits of Mr. Lloyd George's speech was a passage in which he showed how his bitterest personal foes, such as Mr. Pringle and Walter Runciman, had written letters to him within the last year begging him to speak in their constituencies and afterward sent him notes thanking him for having done so.

Quotes Simon's Eulogy.

He also quoted, to the intense enjoyment of his audience, a speech by Sir John Simon, Lord Oxford's principal lieutenant, made within the last two months, in which this eminent lawyer said they thanked God for Lloyd George.

"He now says that he misled the Deity on that occasion," was Lloyd George's biting comment.

The little Welshman received a great reception when he entered the Manchester Reform Club. The entire crowd arose and sang "Auld Lang Syne."

Lloyd George complained that there were also differences within the Labor and Conservative parties on the general strike, but these organizations had been wise enough to keep them to themselves.

Dispute Aired Publicly.

"We are the only party that has insisted on advertising these differences to the public," he declared. "That's the whole difference, and that is where the trouble has come in."

Lloyd George complained that, eight days after the general strike, when he had assumed that these party differences were over, "I was walking peacefully along my path when sudden I was assailed by an angry bull of ex-communication."

Mr. Lloyd George said it was a serious matter to split the Liberal party over whether he was a more attractive colleague than Mr. Pringle.

"I'll tell you what it is," he declared. "It is my 'instability.' Now that's an old charge that has always been brought against any man who is alive. Movement and life—they are always unstable. It is the stick in the muds that are stable."

Mr. Lloyd George then informed his Liberal hearer that "home rule was put through by me entirely, and I don't mind telling you that I sacrificed my Premiership to carry through home rule."

The speaker said he had attended more meetings of the "shadow cabinet" than any of Lord Oxford's colleagues, and now on his first disagreement with the leader of the party he was sacrificed.

"There is only one question of principle and on that I stand, and that if they mean to drum a man out of the Liberal party because he erred on the side of conciliation with millions of British working men in a great dispute—on that proposition I shall fight through to the end. If I am wrong in my judgment—and it is yet to be proved that I am—but if I am, it is peculiarly the place where Liberals ought to be located."

Bore Election Burdens.

Then referring to the grievance of the Asquithians that Lloyd George keeps a separate political fund, the Welsh statesman said that in the two elections fought by the Liberal party since the reunion of the two groups, two-thirds of the cost of those elections fell on his fund and much more financial assistance had been rendered to the party from it since then.

In proof of his complaint that he had not had a fair deal, the former Premier declared that, although Lord Oxford took eight days to reply to his letter, the party leader would not give him (Lloyd George) four days to reply, although he wrote that he was traveling in a remote part of Wales.

Lord Oxford and his friends also had excluded all of Lloyd George's sympathizers from the shadow cabinet, "so that I should not have a friend there to put in a word for me."

"I was not allowed to speak for myself," he continued. "When there was a sentence passed on me driving me out of the councils of the party, I was not allowed to have a friend speak for me. I say that is contrary to every elementary principle of British justice and fair play. You don't treat even the criminals of this country in that way. It is a wretched business, and it looks as if they had made up their minds to get rid of me."

Meanwhile, Mr. Pringle, a former Liberal Member of Parliament, at Blechley Park this afternoon, renewed his charges that within a year Lloyd George had carried on intrigues with a view of joining at one time the Conservative and later the Labor Party. Mr. Pringle said that last August, when many Conservatives were discontented with Premier Baldwin's subsidy to the coal industry, Lloyd George denounced the subsidy and intimated to revive the coalition.

NEW EFFORT TO END BRITISH MINE STRIKE

London, June 9—A renewed effort to bring about a conference between the coal mine owners and the miners is under way. Even Williams chairman of the Mine Owners' Association has taken the initiative with approval of the Government and is sending today by airplane to Brussels a letter to Herbert Smith, president of the Miners' Federation suggesting that a small committee representing the miners and mine owners shall hold a conference in an endeavor to end the strike deadlock. Mr. Smith at present is in Brussels attending a meeting of the Miners' International Federation. The new peace move is thought to have originated in conferences between Government representatives and officials of the Mine Owners' Association during the past few days.

A. J. Cook secretary of the miners union is not concealing the fact that his dignity was deeply wounded because Mr. Williams' letter was not addressed to him as secretary instead of to Mr. Smith as president of the miners' organization. Cook was requested to take the letter to Brussels.

No action on the situation is expected until Mr. Smith returns to England. He is expected to return within a day or two. Meantime everything awaits on the response of the leaders of the miners to Mr. Williams.

Mr. Cook during a speech in London last night announced that the Russian labor unions had sent nearly £400,000 (about 2,000,000) to aid the striking British miners. "Thank God for Russia!" he explained.

The anti-Bolshevik papers here continue sharply to criticize these contributions when the Russian unions did not possess funds for this purpose and say that the money is really a propaganda subsidy of the Soviet Government obtained by a forced levy on the wages of poorly paid Russian workers.

Nell—I like a fellow with lots of go to him don't you?
Belle—Yes, if he takes me along.

SOME STRANGE CATCHES MADE BY FISHERMEN

Fishing a few days ago on an English brook, an angler saw a swallow struggling in the air and found that the bird had snapped at a trout fly dangling from a broken cast which was tangled in a branch and so hooked itself.

Swallows are by no means the only birds that take a fisherman's bait. A lad fishing in the Ouse at Newport Pagnell, says Answers left his baited hook in the water. When he came back he found a kingfisher on it. The bait had been swallowed by a minnow and the minnow taken by the bird. All attempts to release the beautiful creature failed and it had to be destroyed.

Some years ago, an old Aberdeenshire fisherman was playing his rod in Cruden Bay when something struck heavily at his bait under water. His captive fought desperately as he drew it up. Then a great bird darted out of the sea and attacked him furiously striking him in the face with a force that almost stunned him.

Before he could recover himself it was at him again cutting a deep gash two inches long above one eye then splitting open the back of his hand. The old man snatched up a stretcher and managed to kill the bird which proved to be a Great Northern Diver, fully a yard across the wings.

Fishing in the River Camel near Bodmin an angler hooked a fine salmon seal (sea trout) and was playing it when an otter dashed out from under the bank and seized the fish. A few moments of desperate struggle ended in the smashing of the cast and the loss of both fish and tackle.

There is no end to the queer catches which have been made by anglers. In an English river a swimming grass snake was hooked with a fly and actually landed. The contributor has seen a moorhen accidentally hooked and, fishing late in the evening had a bat take one of his flies.

A record in queer catches fell to the lot of well known sportsman fishing for salmon in the Frome. While he was casting his fly over a pool two partridges flew across the stream and one struck the line as it was being drawn back. The bird struggled desperately before it was secured. Then it was found that it was not hooked but noosed round one leg. It was released and went off unharmed.

MAY IMPORT LIVE FISH IN CAKES OF ICE

Chicago, June 11—The possibility of transporting Alaskan blackfish to Chicago by freezing them into solid blocks of ice and then bringing them back to life by a thawing process is being investigated by Walter H. Chite associate director of the $2,000,000 Shedd Aquarium to be erected here.

Early investigation has determined that the fish, principal food of natives of northern Alaska have unusual vitality and are as lively as ever when thawed out after weeks in their icy prisons.

Cases have been reported, Mr. Chite said where fish have been revived after being swallowed whole by Eskimo dogs. In these instances the fish were thawed out by the animal heat of the stomachs, their movements causing the dogs to eject them alive.

Rub with Minard's Liniment. It penetrates, draws out the inflammation and eases the pain.
