"He had a hired man named Jim who was full of th' devil, as were th' rest of us. So we framed it up. When Old Sanford thought it about time for the pullet to begin laying he separated it and gave it a private nest. One day he found a red egg in th' nest. Th' pullet kept playing on th' red. Jim took care of that. We supplied him with th' coloring.

"That fall th' county fair offered a prize for th' best farm freak of any kind. Sanford entered th' hen. We knew that the hen couldn't lay red eggs confined in its coop in th' fair grounds. We hated to see th' old man disappointed, for he was kind to children as well as to chickens.

"It took some scheming, but we got it arranged through attendant. That pullet laid a red egg every day throughout th' fair. Members of th' fair board and judges winked and smiled. It was a great advertisement for the fair, anyway, and Sanford get the first prize.

"But after that th' hen returned 'o the ways of its forebearers. And that's th' reason there ain't no red egg breed of biddies, although th' little red hen is more popular than ever."
