DESCRIBED VISIT TO A LONDON POLICE COURT; TWO WOMEN AND ONE MAN ARE THE TRIANGLE

(Norah K. Thompson in New York Herald-Tribune.)

The old English proverb seems to have been coined especially for the benefit of London's East Enders, for a stranger straying into one of the police courts in that salubrious neighborhood might almost think he had wandered into a hospital casualty ward. He would see women of all ages, pugnacious, mournful, most of them disheveled, some hatless, others wearing a man's old cap set at a rakish angle on their untidy heads, waiting to tell the judge all about it. Black eyes and broken noses are as common as thorns in an English hedgerow.

Occasionally a man appears with a tale of his wife's misdemeanors, but women predominate, and the eternal triangle down in Whitechapel invariably is two women and one man. Feminine, as compared with masculine, eloquence is infinitely superior, both in pungency and volume.

"My husband," said a wife applying for a separation order, "punched me on the nose so violently that my mother's picture fell off the wall!" Two women quarreled violently over a man down on the river side, and we're separated by a constable, who took them both in charge. The judge, endeavoring to find out who started the quarrel, asked one woman: "Now tell me, did you assault her, or did she assault you?" "Well," she answered, "you see sir, it was like this. I just gave her a few words like, and then she bit me on the head with a 'am bone!'"

Since this was their first appearance in court they were let off with a caution and the magistrate turned to the next, a man, who wanted to know if the amount he was paying under a separation order could be reduced.

He was virtuously indignant. "I watched my wife all Saturday night," he said. "She strolled arm in arm with a man from a pub at closing time, and then they strolled across the bridge where the pubs are open longer."

But the court's warrant officer rather spoiled the effect of his charge. "This man," he said, "pays practically nothing to his wife, and he's a gay dog himself." The judge dismissed his complaint. "People who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones," he said wisely.

"My husband came home and sat on the baby and, of course, there was a row," was an angry woman's excuse for throwing saucepans at her husband. Another, when asked where her husband, from whom she wanted a separation, lived, said "partly in bed and partly in the Harp and Thistle." Mrs. Julie Barnett, war widow, charged with deserting her child managed to reduce the whole of Clerkewell Police Court to a state of wonder. The local guardians summoned her repay with the object of making her repay the money they had spent on the child—but they did not know Julie. She is Irish, large, and voluble. Leaning over the rails of the dock she listened placidly to the prosecuting solicitor stating his case. Presently her eyes flashed like living coals. "And it is Irish, ye call me!" she exclaimed. "Can I help being Irish? Did I have the choice of my birthplace? I shall take the child next month, and not a day before. And a word or two I want to say against the guardians with their cold ta—and their cold hearts—and me a war widow."

Here the judge managed to break in. "My good woman," he pleaded, "I am only trying to help you. Don't be angry!"

"Angry, it is?" stormed Julie, shaking a large finger at the bench. "And why should I not be angry? I have no home because the landlord wants more money than there is in the world for his rent. And it's me who has lived with the guardians, may the Lord forgive them, and them giving watches and chains to people from Newcastle and to their own people they give cold tea. Not another penny will they get out of me until next month." Having won her point Julie walked proudly out of court, still stalking about that cold tea.

A man at Willesden, a London suburb, startled the judge by asking: "Please, will you renew this separation order and add on one more child?" It appears that, since the order had been made, he had gone back to his wife but, after eighteen months and the birth of another child, they had decided to be separated again. Once bitten, twice shy, was the plea of a complaining husband at Bow Street who said his wife kept running away from him. "You must display more firmness with her," advised the magistrate, "did once," he replied, "and went to a hospital for a week after."

Women's reasons for wanting a separation from their respective husbands are many, and strange. Here are a few given by wives in the East End the other day.

"My husband always goes to bed with the coal hammer in his pocket." "He deserts me every week end." "He persists in saving money." "He's so mean he uses bath water after some one else to save the expense of heating more." "He's no gentleman—he puts his trousers on before his socks!"

TWENTY-FIVE MEN IN WORLD'S HISTORY HAVE LOOKED ON THE ROOF TREE OF THE WORLD

(Toronto Globe)

Twenty-five men in modern history have looked upon the roof-tree of the world. Six of them stood at the point called the North Pole when Peary realized his ambition, on April 6, 1909. Commander Byrd and his mechanic saw the place where North meets South from the body of a rushing aeroplane, May 9, 1926, and seventeen men on the dirigible Norge looked down on our planet's "axle" when their machine stood still, at 1 p. m., Norwegian time, May 12, 1926.

These things are new, but human curiosity about what existed north of the habitable sections of the globe is as old as intelligence itself. The ancients seem to have had little actual knowledge of the polar regions; but there occur in the writings of their day references to a land where there was no night in summer and no day in winter. By astronomical speculations, the Greeks had come to the conclusion that north of the Arctic Circle there must be a midnight sun at midsummer and no sun at midwinter. There was also a legend that north of the North Wind (Boreas) there was a happy region where the sun was always shining and the Hyperboreans led a peaceful life.

The first traveller in history who probably approached the Arctic Circle and reached the Land of the Midnight Sun was the Greek Pytheas from Naxos (Marseilles), who, about 325 years before the Birth of Christ made a voyage of discovery northward along the west coast of Europe. He visited England, Scotland, the Scottish Isles, and, incidentally, Norway, which he named Thule. This ancient explorer moved the limits of the known world from the south coast of England northward to the Arctic Circle. There is a belief that Pytheas made more than one voyage in the sail and oar driven wooden ships of his day. He is credited with discovering the northern coast of Germany as far east as Jutland.

No other voyages in the unknown North are recorded up to the time of the Irish monk, Disull, who, in writing, about A. D. 825, refers to the discovery by Irish monks of a group of small islands (the Faeroes), and a greater island (Iceland), which he calls Thule. He relates the fact that in that country there was hardly any night at midsummer.

It is possible, say historians, that Iceland and the Faeroes were inhabited by a small Celtic population before the Irish monks went there. The fact that Irish monks lived in Iceland before the Norsemen settled there, in the end of the ninth century, is verified by Icelandic sagas.

King Alfred, in his translation of Orosius, inserts the interesting story of "the first-known Arctic voyage", told him by the Norwegian, Ottar, whom Alfred calls Ohthere. Ottar, about the year 870, rounded the North Cape, sailed eastward along the Murman coast, and discovered the White Sea, where he reached the south coast of the Kola Peninsula and the boundary of the land of the Biarmians (Beornas). Ottar told King Alfred that "he chiefly went thither, in addition to the seeing of the country, on account of walrus."

After Ottar's time the King of Norway took possession of all the land as far east as the White Sea and the land of the Biarmians, and the native Finns had to pay tribute to him. Many voyages, mostly of a hostile nature,

PAY AS YOU ENTER CAMPS FOR TOURISTS

Chicago May 18—Elimination of free motor tourist camps and substitution of pay camps with a uniform charge of 50 cents an automobile was urged by the Outdoor Life Association of America in its annual convention yesterday. The plan was declared to be a measure to establish and maintain the reputation of cross-country motoring so that women may travel alone in greater safety.

Tourist camps have had astounding growth in America the convention was told but because of the evils attending free camps it has been a mushroom growth. Last year's camps disappear others spring up. One million campers are on the road yearly crowding camps in favored places to capacity.

ANOTHER GIRL MADE HER MAD

Winston-Salem, N. C., May 18—Because she had been flitted by Carl Chandler, Sara Foster, 16 years old, deliberately drove a rented automobile into one in which he was riding along Main street.

"I tried to wreck the car," she said. "I'm glad of it and all I regret is that I didn't hurt him. I saw him riding around with another girl and it made me mad. I rented a roadster to follow them."

Another man who is always trying to play both ends against the middle is the performer on the accordion.

but also for trade purposes, were undertaken from Norway to the White Sea, and even kings accompanied the explorers. King Eric, called, "Bloody-Axe," is reputed to have made such a voyage. He died as King of York in England, and fought with the Biarmians about 920. In the year 965 his son, Harold Graafeld, defeated the Biarmians and killed many people in a great battle near the River Dvina, where Archangel was built later.

After having settled in Iceland, in the end of the ninth century, the Norsemen soon discovered Greenland, and settled there. The first who is reported to have seen the coast of Greenland was a Norwegian, Gunnbjorn Ulfsson, who, on his way to Iceland, was storm-driven westward.

The real discoverer and explorer of Greenland was the Norwegian, Eric the Red, who, with his father, had settled in Iceland. As he and his men had there been declared outlaws for having killed several people, they were forced to leave Iceland for three years. Eric went westward to find the land which Gunnbjorn was reported to have seen. He explored the west coast of Greenland for three years, at the end of which time he returned to Iceland, and the following year founded a colony in Greenland.
