MALE CHARACTERS IN NOVELS ARE DEFENDED; WOMEN GET MOST ATTENTION IN BOOKS

New York, March 8—Are men getting a poor deal as they appear in modern fiction?

Eight widely known authors last night gave their views on the literary treatment of each sex by the other, precipitated by a speech made before Brown Alumnae in Providence by Dr. Henry Seidel Canby, editor of The Saturday Review. Dr. Canby thinks that neither women nor men writers today are doing justice to their male characters.

"Women are predominant today as writers of fiction," Dr. Canby said. "They are interested in men only as lovers; they tend always to amorize or to romanticize. Men writers, on the other hand, lavish most of their care on their women characters. Hence men make a poor showing in fiction today. To get real men in books one must go back to Dickens."

Women More Interesting.

Christopher Morley, author of "Thunder On the Left," said:

"If Dr. Canby is right, perhaps it is because at the moment women are more interesting than men. Women are passing through a thrilling phase. Perhaps they have more to conceal, and in the present fashion, less desire to conceal it. One who is in the attic of a burning building does not hide the fact that the house is on fire. Women, even more than men, live in the attic of a burning building."

"It is probably more expensive psychologically to be a woman than to be a man; the cost of doing business psychically is greater; because women have more biological over head to carry. They operate, under a heavier handicap of self-consciousness."

"That, and the fact that they are beautiful, amusing, and hospitable to thought, is why the novelist finds them stimulating."

Ann Parrish Forgets "Bachelor"

"One fundamental basis of all fiction, perhaps, is suggested by an advertisement I sometimes see. It says that you can buy a female canary for $2.00, but a male costs $4.49. It is the novelist's business to find out why that is so."

Ann Parrish forgot her "Perennial Bachelor," and admitted she did not think she could "do a good man."

"I'm afraid it is too true that women do not write well of men considered a part from their women," she said.

"I know how timidly I approach my men, compared with the confidence with which I attack women—it is much easier to show women by little things."

Fannie Champions Women.

Fannie Hurst, first "humoresquely" decided that women were more interesting than men, then, why think it "futile to venture an arbitrary opinion," she thought that perhaps women were monopolizing the field of fiction because of their "new social importance."

"There are so many more things to write about women than there used to be," she pointed out. "Modern fiction reflects the fact. For instance, both 'This Freedom,' by a man and 'Three Kingdoms' by a woman, portray women made possible by the social pattern of the moment."

Suggests Feminine Nom-de-Plumes

Stephen Vincent Benet rued the apparent insinuation that his sex was becoming more and more unpopular, and wondered if it would be "The Beginning of Wisdom" for men writers to adopt feminine nom-de-plumes in an effort to "get by."

"Cabell's 'Jurgen,'" he pointed out with satisfaction, "ought to make up for a good deal of unfairness from women in their treatment of men."

Elinor Wylie disagreed with the theory that women are better used by men in fiction than men by women.

"This fallacy," she said, "seems based on the old byronic idea about love—of man's life a thing apart, 'tis woman's whole existence. Apparently, to Mr. Canby, it seems fair enough that women should be written about only in their relations with men, but that men must in fairness be shown in their affairs not only with women, but with tickers and adding machines also."

"It seems to me that men writers only regard women as those with whom one could, or could not, be in love. I guess women do write of men sentimentally. But men write of women grandiosely."

Helen Hull, of "Quest," felt that "women written of by most modern men writers are just shadows moving through their books."

"At least women are beginning to get over the old affections of the bold literary days of George Eliot and Charlotte Bronte," said Miss Thyra Samter Winslow, "and are about ready to write honestly of both men and women."

WOLF OF LASALLE STREET STARTED A BANK ON HIS BREATH

Chicago, March 8—John W. Worthington, "the Wolf of La Salle street," who died in prison at Atlanta today, had one of the most remarkable careers ever linked with the financial history of Chicago.

It was only last fall that Worthington was placed in a cell, although Chicago agencies of one sort or another had tried since 1912 to imprison him.

Worthington was described by a detective as "the man who started a half million dollar bank on his breath." He spent much of his life explaining his million dollar transactions. For example, he protested when arrested in connection with a "clueless" safe robbery from the Union Pacific railroad at Omaha in March, 1922, after some of the stolen bonds were found in his possession. "It's all a mistake. I handled hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of bonds. I may have handled some of those bonds, but I didn't know they were stolen."

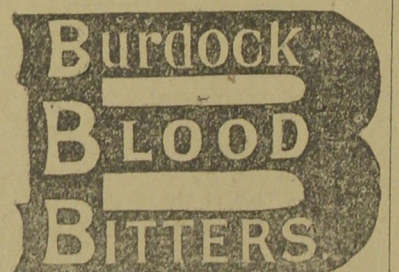

Served Prison Term.

Little is known of his life before 1902. At that time he was released from a New York prison, where he had served four years for swindling Mary E. Smith out of merchandise. Such was his background when he came to Chicago and opened a banking and brokerage office. In 1906 he was the centre of litigation over "The

Was Nearly Crazy From Headaches

Miss K. Brill, 579 Redwood Ave., Winnipeg, Man., writes:—"I was troubled with such severe headaches that some times I was nearly crazy with them."

One day a friend told me about, and advised me to use

so I tried it, and it has done me a world of good. I just took two and a half bottles, and I haven't had a headache for a long time, now."

GIFT CATALOGUE.

There's one, and two, and three and four
I count your gifts, nineteen a score
With wings of wind the figures mount
Out numbering my highest count.

There's music that you give to me;
My soul holds out its hands to be Filled with your lyric beads; then strings
Them into tinkling, lacy things.

And then there is your wondrous gift
Of laughter: When you laugh and lift
Your head back, delicately gay,
You are a drunken April day!

And you have taught me that to grieve
Is not a frailty; to leave
Life's sad intensities unwept
Is faith, you said, but poorly kept.

But more than laughter, music, tears
More than all these the passing years
Will mark the boundless magic of
Your gifts of gifts, your priceless love.

Your love has been a two-edged lance
To cut the coils of circumstance
What if the skies are faint and far
I can reach up to any star!

And yet—and yet is it too vain
To wish I may give back again,
Identical in line and hue,
The cherished gifts I get from you?

But water-lilies, singing long,
Hear in the pool their own sweet song;
And beauty is not any clearer
Redundant in a tarnished mirror.
Philip Gray in Verse

He—Say, you going to be busy this evening?
She—No, I'm not.
He—Then you won't be tired in the morning, will you?
