A MAN OF MYSTERY

Mystery attended Alfred Lowenstein in his life, and it has followed him in his death. The explanation of his disappearance from his private airplane while he was crossing the English Channel is plausible enough; it is stated that he mistook the exit door for the door to the washroom. Yet it is odd that he could have been confused on a machine with which he was perfectly familiar, or that the exit door should not be secured while it was in flight. The alternative suggested is suicide, and no one wants to accept that without the clearest proof. The fact that there was a slump in one of his stocks does not prove that he was in desperate financial difficulties.

Lowenstein was one of the men who rise spectacularly to fortune for no reason that can be discovered precisely. He had the Midas touch. He was venturesome in many of his operations, and he himself explained his rapid accumulation of wealth by saying that he acted on "hunches." In other words, he had what is called "gambler's luck." Of course it would be unfair to call him merely a gambler. He had a lot of solid investments to show for his expenditure—steamship lines, railways, mines, coal properties and the like. Perhaps it was his lavish way of living that created the mystery about his doings. He had villas at Biarritz, a country estate in England, airplanes and a large entourage of secretaries and experts in the sports in which he was interested.

He was, in brief, the restless and busy type of multi-millionaire who perpetually seeks after novelty and lives a life so full of energy that the wonder is his physical capacity is equal to the strain.

EXCEPTIONS

Kettering, scientist, who heads the research department of the General Motors, says the greatest inventions come from the development of the exception to the rule, and not to the development of the rule. The first thing to be done in research work is to put down the exact reasons why, as far as experience goes, a thing has not or cannot be done. Then the true scientist begins to look for the exception and develops that.

Experience is sometimes a hindrance. It stands in your light. It leads you to believe a thing cannot be done. You are judging by the rule. Look for the exception. Develop that.

THE LONGEST HOP

Another aviation record has been hung up by the Italians, Ferrarin and Del Prete, whose achievement in flying from Rome to Brazil is most glorious.

The 3900 miles made by Chamberlain and Levine has been liberally surpassed in the Italy-to-Brazil exploit without a stop in a span of nearly 4,500 miles.

Oceans—when they behave reasonably well—have ceased to worry the birdmen, with their high-powered, long range engines.

The Sackville Post learns that Hon. R. B. Bennett leader of the Conservative party has arranged to address to large open air meeting at "The Rocks", Hopewell Cape, Albert County, during the latter part of this morning. The Hopewell Cape Rocks are near the birthplace of Hon. Mr. Bennett and are visited by many tourists and picnic parties during the summer months. Being easily reached by motor car from Moncton St. John and elsewhere no doubt the Conservative chieftain would be greeted by an enormous gathering of people.

Make mistakes pay. It can be done. Sometimes a sad and serious mistake, regarded thoughtfully and honestly, can so emphasize your weakness and your need that you will begin a new policy which will permit no such mistakes in the future. Instead of mourning your errors make them the starting point of a new program. Bad mistakes are sometimes the best things that ever happen to us. It all depends on whether we have intelligence enough to get the constructive value out of them.

The old fashioned Tonboy, who used to take pride in her ability to negotiate a six-foot fence, now looks on with horror when she sees her granddaughter climbing into the rumble seat of a car.

The prize hard luck story of the month comes from the west: A speeder, two months behind in payments on his used car, was pursued by a motorcycle cop who proved to be the party from whom he had bought it.

It now appears that the automotive engineering field is becoming stultified to the extent that a lot of garage mechanics are going back to paper-hanging.

A man is never able to describe a woman's costume to his wife, and perhaps it's just as well. His enthusiasm would probably be ground for more unjust suspicion.

Eastern college has abandoned idea of summer course for parents. His could it be successful when its students have no one to write home to for money.

It used to be that a woman who married once made matrimony a career, but in these days it isn't unusual to have one make several careers of it.

Exhaustive and exhausting experiments, scientific and semi-scientific prove that while you may mend the mightiest dam in the world nothing will repair a leak in the garden hose.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, generally reputed to be the richest man in the world observed his 89th birthday on Sunday.

The young grads, fearful of robbery, needn't worry. The world is entirely filled with people who wouldn't take the trouble to steal a diploma.

Then again, middle age is that period of life when a favorite collar button seems more important than a director's meeting.

A woman driver's sixth sense is the knowledge that the man in the other car will figure out what she's trying to do if it's humanly possible.

Infant prodigy said "Daddy" when only two weeks old. At her present age of seven months she probably calls him "Old Thing."

Ghost with a cough puzzles Welsh town. Well, one thing about him, he doesn't smoke those kind of cigarettes that come in carloads.

When the political orator intends to do a particularly good job of dodging he says: "Now let us face the facts."

Golfing adds to man's physical assets. It sometimes also increases his lie abilities.

In the old days, generally speaking of wine, women and song only the wine was good.

Don't be fooled; one mistake doesn't cancel another.
