DUKE OF NEWCASTLE THINKS GREAT MODERN PROBLEM IS TO KEEP PEOPLE ON THE LAND

English Landlord and Farmer Says We are Not Agriculturally Minded — Congregation in Cities a Menace—Recommends More Tractors for Prairie Farmers.

(Special to The Daily Mail.)

Jasper, Alta., Aug. 30—"In spite of the railways and automobile and other modern means of rapid transportation and communication which have made the world so much smaller and have done away, so one would think, with the so-called loneliness of country life, one of our greatest problems today is that urge to congregate in cities", so said the Duke of Newcastle this evening in the course of an interview at Jasper Park Lodge. It was a great pity, he thought, that the British people were as a whole not more agricultural minded and he felt the need of a more widely established system that would educate prospective emigrants in the ways of the farm life of the Dominion. As a farmer he has a tract of land in Surrey which has been his hobby for years. The Duke of Newcastle was keenly interested in all he saw along the Canadian National line across the prairie. "I did not read a line on the train from Winnipeg to Jasper," he said, "I looked out of the windows and saw what I could of your farming methods. One thing that struck me was the lack of tractors, why do you use horses on these wide plains?" Conditions in England, he said, were steadily improving although with taxation so heavy it was hard uphill fight. One by one the great country estates were disappearing but, this was due not alone to taxation and death but the change in outlook. Life in the country was unfortunately going out of date. One good thing the changes are bringing about he said, "that everyone has to work". The Duke of Newcastle, who is accompanied by his youngest daughter Lady Mary Hope and her friend Miss Phunter, will remain in Jasper eight or ten days. "I came here on the recommendation of my son who was here last year," he said, "He told me it was the most beautiful spot in Canada and I can quite understand his enthusiasm."

HARVESTERS WELL PLACED

Winnipeg, Aug. 30—A good steady stream of requests for harvesters is being received at the offices of the Employment Service of Canada here, J. A. Bowman, who is in charge, declared today, in referring to reports reaching here to the effect that many harvesters were walking the roads in the west unable to obtain work.

Only one complaint had been received from British harvesters, Mr. Bowman declared, and this concerned three men who claimed they had been turned out at night by a farmer. This was being investigated.

Eastern Canadian harvesters had mostly refused to be directed to placements on arrival here, Mr. Bowman continued, and insisted on picking their own destination with the result that the districts near the large centres would get an overflow. This might explain reports that numerous harvesters were walking the roads.

EUROPEAN POWERS MUST WORK TOGETHER TO AVOID WAR

(Anonymous in the Manchester Guardian.)

War came in 1914 not because England, France or Germany desired it, but because England, France and Germany could not work together to prevent it. The blame for that failure is distributed differently by different judges, but however the blame is distributed that failure was the cause of the war. Nobody thinks that either Lord Lansdowne or Lord Grey, the two Ministers who established our new relations with France, wanted to quarrel with Germany. It is abundantly clear that what they both wanted was that England should be on good terms with Germany as well as with France. Forces were too strong for them, or the problems were beyond their capacity. Holstein, the evil genius of her Foreign Office, inspired Germany to try to break up the new entente partly by intrigue, partly by threats. The effect was just the opposite, for it hardened the new entente into a stiffer combination. Lansdowne, afraid for our new friendship, hastened to urge France to take us into her confidence, and close consultation began. With the crisis of the winter of 1905 England and France drew still closer together. The more anxious the became, the farther they went in providing against danger, the more they excited suspicion in Germany, suspicion for which both the English and the French Governments were partly to blame by their original handling of the Morocco question. This suspicion Lord Grey deplored, for, like his predecessor, he desired to improve our relations with Germany while keeping our new friendship with France. Lord Haldane was sent to Berlin, and other efforts were made to win Germany's confidence and goodwill. At times, as at the Balkan Conference, it looked as if these efforts might succeed. But the crisis of 1914 caught Europe when this tension still dominated the nerves of Western Europe, and the war was the result.

Nobody thinks today that England, France or Germany desires war. But unless England, France and Germany can work together to prevent it war will come. And at present the prospect of such co-operation is poor, and getting poorer. After the war everybody felt that we were at any rate freed from some of the chief embarrassments of the past. The old military Government was gone, and the Kaiser, whose tactless egotism made him a constant danger to peace, was now in exile. Nobody who studies the volumes of Foreign Office documents carefully can help seeing that the accident which had put this vain and moody actor at the head of a disciplined and powerful people enormously complicated the efforts of statesmanship to draw Europe out of the terrible circle into which her politics had fallen. On the other hand, the passions of the war and the resentment excited in Germany by the severity of the peace terms made it difficult to begin the work of reconciliation and to bring England, France, and Germany together in constructive work. These difficulties, which threatened to postpone the recovery of Europe indefinitely, seemed to have passed when, following on Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's success in bringing France and Germany together, Sir Austen Chamberlain asked Parliament to ratify the Locarno Treaty. Germany had accepted the western frontier imposed by the Peace; Germany, France, and England had given reciprocal guarantees for its protection, and Germany was about to enter the League. At last it looked as if we might pursue with some hope of success the aim that had baffled pre-war Europe, and the failure of which had caused the war.
