ONE KILLED 7 INJURED IN PLANE CRASH

Atlantic City, N. J., Oct. 18—One man was fatally injured and seven others seriously hurt in a crash of a Junkers all-metal aeroplane, sister ship of the Trans-Atlantic plane Bremen. The passengers, mostly members of the Investment Bankers' Association, were taking a sight-seeing trip over the city.

W. O. Chanute, of Denver, Colo., died in the city hospital, as a result of his injuries.

George King, pilot of the plane, with the passengers, had taken off from Bader Field, a short time before the crash. He had circled the city and was apparently heading back to land at Bader Field. Flying at about 2000 feet, the big ship seemed to go into a tail-spin directly over the thoroughfare near the Lulu Temple Yacht Club. Then, witnesses said, the plane seemed to right itself, but immediately went into another spin and crashed to the meadows near the trestle of the Shore Fast Line. The plane struck the soft mud near the city water main that runs across the meadows, the engine burying itself six feet in the ooze.

The injured lay for fully 15 minutes before help arrived. The place where the plane fell is one of the most isolated in the city and is practically inaccessible except by train.

Police who arrived at the thoroughfare were unable to get to the place except by crossing several third rails and wading in water almost waist deep.
