THE SIGNIFICANT SPARROW

He dances, in his sombre stole,
As vainly as an oriole.

He hops, he skips, he pirouettes,
He feverishly lives, and sweats.

He nominates a plump gray wife
To share his interesting life.

Then chirps his pride from tree to tree,
Unconscious of absurdity!

Let those who think they can, persuade
Him that he's not a gay young blade.

Hark to the witless rune he sings;
Observe his dull, bedraggled wings.

Then watch him preen himself and strut—
The poor, vainglorious little nut!

And yet, despite his dingy plume,
He earns his cosmic elbow-room.

He owns, in fact, one special grace:
He typifies the commonplace!

LADY BADEN-POWELL MAKES INITIAL SPEECH

(Special to The Daily Mail)

VICTORIA, B. C., April 10—Lady Baden Powell made her first speech on Canadian soil this afternoon when she told 450 members of the Women's Canadian Club and their friends about experiences during the recent far eastern and Antipodean tour of herself and Chief Scout Lord Baden Powell.

Outlining the origin of scouting as its branch, the girl guide movement. Lady Baden Powell spoke of the great interest taken in the establishment of the now wide world organization by King Edward VII, an interest, which King George carried on when he ascended the throne May 6, 1910.

Most interesting feature of their recent tour, the Chief of the Girl Guides declared was the Jamboree held at Melbourne in celebration of the Centennial when 11,000 scouts from all states and districts of the commonwealth turned as one at the command, "Left turn leave the arena", in perfect discipline and in perfect order.

Brown-eyed, tanned to a becoming olive through which gleamed the glow of health, Lady Baden Powell spoke energetically and made a striking picture in her slate blue guide uniform and wide brimmed uniform hat. Various nationalities represented in the scout and guide organization she described as illustrating the true international character and she told of how scouts from Arabia marched to see them passing in their ship through the Red Sea. "They came sixty miles in the dark to cheer a dark ship", she said.

What is the use of keeping one's mouth shut in the general discussion? Who else does? On the other hand, what is the use of opening it?

U. N. B. Dramatic Society Puts On Spring Theatrical

The University of New Brunswick Dramatic Society put on three one-act plays at the Opera House last evening, a fairly large number being present. The plays were well acted and produced and the final play of the evening, "The House of Juke," disclosed an unusual and highly amusing situation. It was probably the most successful play of the evening from the point of audience interest the laughs which it brought were hearty and sincere. William Morrissey, Ernest VanDine and William Springford, and Miss Margaret Fraser were amusing and quite convincing as "hill-billies." "Jake Juke" (Ernest VanDine) almost loses caste when he brings a respectable "night school" teacher (Miss Marjorie Matheson, into the family and says he intends to marry her. The "hill billy" argument, in which Miss Fraser and William Morrissey and Mr. VanDine engage, as to whether "Jake" should turn respectable, go to night school, and work all way, furnishes some spontaneous merriment on the part of the audience. The play was directed by Ernest VanDine and he showed fine taste in his selections of cast and the manner in which he produced it.

"Banquo's Chair," a brief mystery episode, written by Rupert Crofts-Cooke, was a murder mystery situation with an original ending, and stood out because of fine acting performances by Charles Scotcher, Horace Block, Bert Sutherland and George Johnston. The scene is an old house on Sydenham Hill, England. A murder of an old woman had been committed there, and Sir William Brent, retired chief of Scotland Yard (Charles Scotcher) before his two friends, Harold Gandy, well known novelist (Horace Block) and Robert Stone (Bert Sutherland) conducts an eerie experiment to show that the murder was actually committed by one John Bedford (George Johnston). Gandy and Stone are invited by the police head to be present on a certain evening, and Bedford has been invited also. The experiment is the common one of calling up the figure of the old woman, which the police chief manages to do by securing the services of a well known actress. So while the four men sit at conversation over cards, suddenly the lights go out. Bedford is startled by the sight of the "ghost" and frightened into a confession. Bedford is taken away by police constables (Norman McLeod and Winthrop Hawkins). The ending is a good one, Sir William Brent receives a telegram shortly after the man is removed, and he and his friends are astonished at the message, which is that the actress, who was to have been the "ghost" was unable to be there for the experiment. Who then took the part of the ghost? Scotcher's performance as Sir William Brent was well rounded and George Johnston when he had occasion to act did it well. Jack Thurott in his first appearance in U.N.B. theatricals was a flawless butler, even to the accent. Robin Bayley directed the play ably.

"The Constant Lover," a flimsy little play, which featured a park bench conversation between a boy and girl, Miss Mary VanWart and Mr. Robin Bayley, would have been more effective had the two principles talked more to the audience. Some of Mr. Bayley's best lines, and Miss VanWart's too, were lost because they couldn't be heard. Even then, however, the play of words between the pair on what a constant lover is, had its funny moments. This play also was directed by Mr. Bayley.

During the intermissions music was furnished by George Olts and his orchestra.

BEHIND THE SCENES

A dropped cigarette which fell between the chinks in the floor backstage at the U. N. B. spring theatrical in the Opera House last evening resulted in a curling wisp of smoke and it was mistaken for fire. The fire department was notified but when the firemen arrived they found no fire. The U. N. B. players deserve credit in the manner in which they handled it, and no one in the audience surmised that anything like a fire was in progress.
