But Would We Learn Even From Failure?

They are very naive who argue that it is a good thing to give Social Credit the trial and error test in Alberta. The argument is that it is worth-while to have Social Credit tried out once and for all; and that when it has been proved an absurdity, the whole movement for Social Credit will come to a stop, and we shall thus be rid of that particular form of economic candy-floss. But political history in Canada does not encourage one to expect such a result.

Reading the record of our railway mistakes suggests that we have never learned from any collapse, from any failure. Rather, as each ambitious political railway venture has failed, there has been an earnest effort to start something more awesome to swallow up the previous mistake and conceal it from view. The complete failure of public ownership of some of our railways merely led to the supreme effort to set up a gigantic political monopoly, the Canadian National Railways. Now that it too has failed, financially, there is a grave danger that we may attempt to cover up that mistake by a larger state monopoly of all railways in Canada.

Similarly we have gone on from one mistake to other and larger ones in the case of wheat. The collapse of the wheat pool dictatorship merely led to the operation of a purported stabilization scheme. Its utter failure has given us now a wheat board to enable the failure of the stabilization scheme to be obscured. What will succeed the wheat board we cannot say. But unless good fortune or Divine Providence intervenes people can count on some further political insanity.

If Social Credit is tried and collapses in Alberta, will that end it? Not at all. The cry will be "On to Ottawa". It will be said that it is necessary to try Social Credit on a national scale. If it is tried on a national scale and fails, it will be said that the banks failed, it will be said that the banks failed to co-operate and that it is necessary to nationalize the banks. Then if failure continues to dog its footsteps the plea will be that all the instruments of production must be nationalized and so on and on until the ultimate objective will be Socialism or Communism.—Financial Post.
