Pearl S. Black, novelist, who recently married her publisher, said to a reporter:

"Not many of us writers succeed in writing a best seller, yet some people talk as if the feat was just a matter of luck—as if every successful writer was a Yot Lung.

"Yot Lung was the village half-wit but he went to a weight-guessing contest and won a fine ox by guessing its weight to a pound.

"How did you do it?" they asked him, as he was leading off the ox.

"Oh," he said, "it was nothing at all. I'd have done much better if I had been in practice."

IF THEY FIGHT LIKE ALGERIANS'

So Remarked a World War Veteran in Speaking of the Soldiers of Ethiopia.

NEW YORK, Sept. 13—"If there is a war in Ethiopia and the Ethiopians fight like the French Algerians did during the world war we are going to have a scrap that will look like a million Joe Louis' meetings their equals."

This is the way a world war veteran sums up the current foreign situation. Having served with the French army and later with the Americans in France, this veteran encountered the French Colonial troops in action several times.

"They were devils turned loose," he recalled. "Only trouble, they were erratic and hard to handle, but I thanked my lucky stars many a time that I wasn't serving with the Germans opposite those wild black men."

"The fighting they liked the best was trench raiding. They always carried long vicious looking cutlasses—looking very much like scimitars. It seems they felt unprotected with only a rifle."

"When they'd go over the top it was not uncommon for them to throw their rifles away and leap into a trench with only their gleaming knives. That's the way they learned to fight, and that's the way they wanted to fight, civilization notwithstanding."

"If the French strategists had taught them to fight that way they couldn't have thought of a better way to strike fear and panic into the hearts of the enemy."

"One time we had a gang of them digging reserve trenches in the Verdun sector. It was a beastly hot day. I was with a detail stringing new buzzerphone wires back from the Company P. C.'s. When we got to the reserve lines and saw these black giants, lackadaisically swinging their picks and shovels, and resting, for five minutes after each swing, I bawled out to them in the way a chain-gang driver might bawl—in English, of course, believing that it wouldn't mean anything to them, and might relieve my spleen a bit."

"The biggest and blackest man in the gang came right back at me in more murderous epithets than my own. Amazing! But the joke was on me. And it was good American English he was using, at that. I picked up a brief conversation to find out how he happened to land in the French Colonials, although I felt as if I was risking my neck in doing so—his shiny bolo knife gleamed at his side like a headman's sword."

"Well, it isn't important how he landed in the Algerian outfit, but what was important—he took a handful of shriveled, dried things out of his pocket that looked something like dried apricots that had lost their color, I asked him what they were."

"Ears!" he said.

"He had seventeen left ears in his pocket that he had sliced from his victims in trench raids. Said he hoped his regiment would get back into action again soon, because he needed twenty of those souvenirs to take back to Africa before he could marry the apple of his eye—an African princess! Twenty left ears of the enemy was her stipulation before she would believe him brave enough to deserve the fair."

"My ears tingled while I looked at his ghastly collection—especially when it seemed that he was sizing up my left ear with the faint glimmer of an idea slowly taking shape in his big rolling eyes. Believe me, I didn't prolong that conversation! How would an African princess distinguish between a German and American left ear?"

"So, if the Ethiopians get a chance for that kind of fighting look out. If I were an Italian general I'd make earmuffs part of the regulation uniform."

STORY OF OBSCURE HERO IN MEDICAL FIELD IS TOLD

Doctor Bravely Carries On Despite Long Period of Bad Luck

MONTREAL, Quebec, Sept. 13—There are many popular heroes in the medical profession yesterday the men who discovered insulin, cortin, and the liver cure for pernicious anaemia; the men who are in the limelight of the war against cancer, infantile paralysis, tuberculosis and other dread scourges, see their names in the headlines regularly. They not infrequently receive heavy fees and emoluments, and just as frequently spend them all on research work to further the cause of scientific treatment of human ailments.

And then again there are other heroes in the profession of whom most of the time no one ever hears. Oliva Dionne's epic feat brought one of them into the limelight, much against his wish. Indefatigable servants of science and of mankind knowing much of medicine but generally little of economics, almost every rural district has its country doctor who has to treat everything in turn from gestation to indigestion, from a catarrh to a cut throat and never has time to specialize in anything; much less to worry about such mundane trivialities as collecting fees and acquiring funds.

The story of such a one came to light this week when Drs. F. E. Thompson and A. Max Lightstone of the Women's General Hospital received a communication from a rural clergyman, telling of a doctor in an obscure corner of the Eastern Townships who has known every kind of bad luck in his 35 years of practice and is still bravely carrying on. His misfortunes reached their climax last Friday night, when his home was burned to the ground. The fire spread to his garage and his barn and when the last ember burned out he had not so much as a change of shoes or shirt left.

He had no insurance. What money he had, was stored in a trunk and went up with the rest. His furniture and his family's clothing, his stock of medicines, medical and surgical instruments and the equipment of his office; his medical library; his automobile, a buggy, a cutter, a set of harness, 15 tons of hay, all was reduced to debris and ruin.

He is the father of six dependent children one of them an invalid daughter aged 5. They are being sheltered by neighbors. The younger ones are still going to school, but have neither clothes nor school books.

Despite it all, the doctor is sticking to his job. The people cannot do without him. He is the only doctor in the neighborhood.
