Interest to Women

NOW IT'S DAUGHTER WHO IS BRINGING UP MOTHER

Ruth Cameron Makes a Few Observations and Passes On a Few Hints Which May Prove Valuable During the Process

We hear an awful lot nowadays about child training. Why not have some rules for mother training? I submit the following set as they might be written by the up-to-date daughter—if she were honest.

Have your mother learn that nothing must interfere with your good times.

If you have promised to help your mother choose a new dress and you get a chance to go golfing instead, don't disappoint your golfing partner. He will ask some other girl and she may play a better game or prove such good company that he'll ask her next time instead of you. Anyway, your mother probably knows what she likes better than you do even if she did ask you to come along and give her the benefit of your good taste in selecting clothes.

Always look your best when you go on a date. That extra 15 minutes you spend readjusting the curl on the left top side or replacing a bobby pin for the sixth time is important. It may not leave you time to straighten up the bathroom, but your mother will do it after you leave. She will hang up the towels you left on the floor or draped over the edge of the tub, and she will turn out the light you left on, put the cover on the powder box and wash out the tub. It's really foolish to do it yourself. It may make you late, and no man likes to be kept waiting. It's good form nowadays to be on time.

Don't Encourage Nagging

Don't encourage your mother in nagging. If she has the habit of fretting because you leave your hat on the piano and your gloves on the table, and your tennis racket on the radiator and your wet bathing suit in the back hall, and your curlers on the bathroom shelf, and the Sunday paper scattered over the floor, pay no attention. If you humor her by putting things where they belong she'll only find something else to fuss about. Pay no attention and she'll get resigned to picking up after you and stop grumbling about it. She'll see that she's just wasting her breath and not getting anywhere.

If your mother is the neurotic type that lies awake nights worrying when you are out late, you must not encourage her in this idiosyncrasy. She may exact a promise from you not to come in later than 2 o'clock. But if the crowd decides to take a run out to "Joe's Place on the Pike" for hot dogs about that time, by all means go along. Your mother may be asleep when you come in and not know what time it was, and even if she lies awake it's perfectly silly of her to worry so about accidents just because crazy Skeets Moore crashed his car when he was a little tight. Most boys are really very careful drivers.

Don't waste time keeping a budget. This budget idea is really overdone. Or if you do want to keep some sort of accounts, just to humour your mother, don't try to remember every little tiny silly item. The one really sensible budget I ever heard of was kept by a bride: "Received from Billy, $75. Spent, $75." Brief, accurate and no time wasted trying to remember how many packages of cigarettes you smoked last week and drivel like that.

And, by the way, speaking of spending—if you find your funds giving out and you get a chance to buy a perfectly darling evening gown at a real bargain—don't let it get away from you. Marj Jenkins may beat you to it. Charge it on your mother's account. She may scold a little but in the end she'll probably pay for it and tell your father she got it for herself.

Mothers have their good points.

Why Some Experts Drown

Here are a few suggestions:

- 1—The expert swimmer often gets drowned when the boat tips over because he starts for the shore and doesn't hang on to the boat.
- 2—The expert swimmer often overtaxes his strength. His heart is not as strong as his nerve and his desire to show off.
- 3—The expert swimmer who is more expert with his arms and legs than with his head dives into water in places where his head hits logs and rocks.
- 4—The expert swimmer dares to do things which are foolish and takes unnecessary risks.
- 5—The expert swimmer doesn't seem to know that he can get a "cramp" as quickly as the poor swimmer.

Remember, therefore, that, even if you are an "expert swimmer," you have a heart which may be overtaxed. In general, don't go in swimming after eating a full meal until one hour has passed.

Swim before breakfast, but don't swim a long time. Stay in a short time only. Rub vigorously.

The hotter you are the less inclined you should be to go into the water. Cool off before you go in. A really "expert swimmer" has these qualifications:

- 1—He knows the depth of the water and the location of rocks and sunken logs and springholes.
- 2—He knows his heart and the

Precautions to Take While Swimming

Swimming is good exercise. It is good for health. It is refreshing, and it is a wholesome and invigorating recreation. It is something to be encouraged.

But there are rules of your own to be followed, and if you are in a camp there are rules of the camp. I once had a bitter experience when at a camp. The rule was, "Go swimming only at the regular swimming time and at the regular swimming place. Never go alone. Instructor condition of his stomach.

- 3—He doesn't show off before girls (Boys behave much more sensibly when there are no girls around.)
- 4—He knows how to use his head if the boat overturns.
- 5—He knows how to save a person from drowning.
- 6—He knows how to resuscitate the one who is nearly dead.

BURDEN NOTES

HISTORY TURNS BACKWARDS AS LOUISBURG MUSEUM OPENS

The pages of North American history will be turned back for more than 200 years, when the historical museum building on the site of Louisbourg Fortress, Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, is officially opened this month. Several representatives of the Governments of Great Britain, France and the United States are expected to join with Lieutenant governors, senators, members of the Dominion parliament and Provincial legislatures at the formal dedication ceremonies, which will be presided over by the Hon. T. A. Crerar, Minister of the Interior.

Once the proudest fortress and only walled city in North America, Louisbourg in the brief span of less than 50 years experienced all the drama and tragedy associated with centuries. Constructed by the French between 1717 and 1740 at the capital of the Acadian settlement on Ile Royal, as Cape Breton was then called, the fortress served as a naval base for French privateers and a clearing house for trade between Old and New France. Its military importance was unquestioned, for it guarded the mouth of the St. Lawrence and constituted an ever present menace to the New England colony. Its fortifications cost the present equivalent of ten million dollars, and were considered by their designers to be impregnable to attack either from land or sea.

Captured by a colonial expedition from Massachusetts under William Pepperell and Commodore Peter Warren in 1745, Louisburg was returned to the French in 1748 under the provisions of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. During the next ten years the great fortress was greatly strengthened, and the garrison was well prepared to meet the next attack of the English under Major General Amherst and Admiral Boscawen in June, 1758. After a siege of nearly two months, during which most of the outposts and batteries were captured, Louisbourg capitulated for the last time and the combined English forces took possession. Two years later orders were received from England for its complete destruction, and for six months soldiers worked with explosives, spades and levers until nothing remained of the noble citadel but a shattered group of casemates or bombproof shelters.

For years the site remained neglected, until the ruined fortifications were overgrown with sod, and small farms had been established above the ruins. Impressed by its historical importance the Department of the Interior in 1928 negotiated the purchase of private holdings, and since that time has secured control of more than 300 acres in the immediate vicinity. Considerable restoration work has been carried out from time to time by the National Parks Service of Canada. Bomb-proof shelters have been partially restored main streets have been excavated, foundations of principal buildings unearthed and rebuilt, and outstanding features designated by appropriate markers.

The new museum, constructed of native Nova Scotia stone, has been designed to harmonize with the surroundings, following architectural lines of the French period of occupation. It incorporates modern features of construction, if fireproof, and will house a large and interesting exhibit of historical relics relating to early Acadian history. Louisbourg Fortress is accessible from Sydney, Nova Scotia, by a good motor road, a distance of 26 miles.
