FROM TENTS TO SKYSCRAPERS IN FIFTY YEARS

Happening to remember that this year is the 50th anniversary of the foundation of Johannesburg and learning that the biggest city of South Africa has grown to a population of 438,000 in half a century, we decided to ask Mr. Stegmann of the Stegmann Publications to give us a few facts about his city and original birth place. The result was almost an embarrassment of riches amongst which choice was difficult.

"Most citizens even of Johannesburg," Mr. Stegmann said, "are unaware that beyond the old law courts south of the city proper, is the quarter where the city began.

The canvas town of the first prospectors made its appearance in this locality then known as Ferreira's Town, so called by courtesy for there were only tents and a few sheet iron shacks in pioneer days.

About the old buildings some of which still remain, there dwells a spirit of melancholy mingled with pride and regret for at Ferreira's Town was laid the foundations of the fortunes of Barney Barnato, Joel Ekstein and other Rand pioneers. Here many a lifelong friendship was cemented over a cup of coffee, in the '80's by little known men afterwards to be numbered in South Africa's roll of fame.

The early nineties were times of depression. It had been found out that rich as the Rand was it was no place for the small operator in the final analysis. It was owing to men with capital courage and resourceful experience gained in other fields—especially those of Barberton and Kimberley that Johannesburg did not peter out in from twenty to twenty-five years, leaving a ruined city.

Among those the city remembers with gratitude is J. D. Robinson who arrived, tradition says driving a cape cart and wearing a white pith helmet. He and Henry Nourse together bought the farm of the Widow Oosthuizen, the site of the famous main reef gold strike. Nourse, an extraordinary character was a great soldier, and a famous athlete, whose feats of physical prowess have become legendary. Nourse had offered the Widow Oosthuizen 6000 pounds as the purchase price of her farm, which was all he had. The widow insisted on 10,000. The more he bargained the less the widow wished to sell. Nourse told Robinson of his difficulty. Perhaps he was more persuasive—perhaps it was the effect of his white pith helmet on one of a sex which has never been able to resist a new style in hats. At any rate Robinson closed the deal and he and Nourse became partners and for a time grew rich together.

Alfred Bert had already made a fortune in co-operation with Rhodes. The little German had a delicate stomach and amusing stories are told of his horror and dismay when forced to partake of the lavish Boer hospitality when negotiating the purchase of a valuable farm. To refuse might offend his hosts and ruin the chances of the deal. To accept meant acute gastritis. At times the poor little German was always in tears. He finally established his own firm on the Rand—the famous Corner House, which was to give Johannesburg some of its greatest figures in mining history.

Hermann Eckstein, another great figure, is held in grateful remembrance by the mining industry for shrewd and daring financing of the Infant Rand during its critical period. It was also his wisdom in importing American engineers, whose experience, training and sagacity first made the industry and then did much to save it. Among many famous names the best known in United States and Canada is John Hays Hammond. Hammond in company with Frank Rhodes, Phillips and Farrar was afterwards condemned to death by Judge Gregorowski for his important part in the Jameson Raid. His sentence was commuted to a fine of 25,000 pounds, upon payment of which he and his wife returned to the United States. He continued his distinguished professional career in the U.S. and at one time in later life became a candidate for the American Presidency.

Another distinguished character was the colorful Abe Bailey. Bailey went first to the strike at Barberton. He says in his memoirs: "I was in Barberton seven months and during my stay I won a gold medal in Filling's circus for riding a horse in a contest, standing up without saddle or bridle. I was fined a sovereign for a scrap with a policeman. I fought with a Dutchman who boasted he had shot a lot of Englishmen and meant to shoot them again. He had me taken before the Landrost De Villiers, who on hearing what he had said told me I could kick him again."

This is an illustration of the fair treatment given to the English in the early days of the Boer government and officials.

Sir Abe Bailey told that he was once sent by Barney Barnato to buy Leeuwpoort for $5,000 pounds. Bailey no doubt wishing to shade this price a little protracted the negotiation. In the end he paid 95,000 pounds. On his return Barnato told him "Give a fool time to think and he will think as well as you do."

Barney Barnato was a London gammon of Jewish cockney birth, born in Whitechapel. His real name was Barnett Isaacs. At twenty-one he came to South Africa, and alighted with fifty pounds in his pocket. He began to buy diamonds from the diggers at the sorting tables straight from the wash.

He is said to have noticed that a successful rival buyer had an old yellow pony, which through long usage had grown to know his master's customs so well that he turned into their diggings without being guided by the rein. Barnato bought the pony and by letting it follow its accustomed route, soon had the list of all his rival's customers where bargains could be picked up.

He made money and opened up an office in a tin shanty for the use of which he paid a guinea a day. Said he, "It is well worth it if one makes 30 shillings." As business continued to increase he bought four sections of the Kimberley mines. Soon he practically controlled them.

Cecil Rhodes had acquired a similar control of the De Beers group. Rhodes intended to acquire a dominant interest in the Kimberley mines also, buy up all claims or drive the independent diggers out of existence by efficient production, and control the market.

Barnato could not get Rhodes to agree to his system of price fixing which he favored and the fight was on. Rhodes' associates were loyal. Barnato's were not. Even so, Rhodes was forced to enlist the European capital of the Rothschilds to win. Alfred Beit's invaluable aid and financial assistance proved decisive. An honorable peace was made at last. Wisely and generously Barnato was made a life director of the new company.

With Rhodes' backing he entered politics as member for Kimberley. Only one speech he made is still remembered. There was a law in force at that time that liquor could not be sold on Sundays unless a substantial meal was eaten with it.

Reich Told It Needs a Political Stomach

BERLIN, Nov. 19—A "political stomach" is one of the German people's most important needs under the new four-year plan to make Germany as independent as possible of foreign raw materials, the official Nazi party news service says.

By a "political stomach" the news service means one which willingly, not to say gladly, accepts and makes the most of such limited foodstuffs as it is going to get in the next 4 years.

The first political lesson the German stomach must learn is to eat lots of cabbages, of which this year's crop is especially good, the party news service says.

VEGETARIAN MUST FIND MEAT FOR 67,000,000

BERLIN, Nov. 19—A man who eats no meat at all must find it for 67,000,000 Germans this winter.

Every one in Germany knows that Chancellor Adolf Hitler is a vegetarian. Yet millions of good Nazis show no intention of aping his diet. Hence the meat problem has become most serious. The mere whisper of a pork tice, I was in a very awkward situation."

Barnato bitterly resented Judge Gregorowski's conduct of the case against the principals in the Jameson Raid perhaps because his nephew Solly Joel was one of those on trial. Meeting the Judge he commented on the trial with more zeal than judgment.

"Mr. Barnato," said the justly annoyed Judge, "you are no gentleman!" "Maybe," said Barnato, "but you are no Judge!"

With his position under Rhodes a sinecure, Barnato threw his energies into racing and gambling which did not prove enough to occupy his active mind. Acute nervous trouble and fancied worries at last shook his mental balance. He set off on a trip to England, but when his ship docked at Southampton it was only the lifeless body of the Whitechapel boy, which returned to find a rest in the land of his birth. The cunning, acute and restless spirit was at last done with plots and stratagems.

Other interesting information regarding the actual growth of the city and its history furnished by Mr. Stegmann will be published in another article in the near future.

Tea for every Taste

shortage sends shivers of dread through many of the population.

Chancellor Hitler has never told the nation it would be better off without meat, nor has he sponsored any kind of a vegetarian movement.

Der Fuehrer does, however, encourage his lieutenants to deride the meat eater who must have the kind of meat he wants when he wants it, and the housewife who scorns all but the choice cuts.

What might happen if the German people were forced into vegetarianism by the meat scarcity is anybody's guess. At any rate, they are confidently relying on Chancellor Hitler, the vegetarian, to prevent it.
