MAN on the STREET

(By W. T. Whitehead)

Currency and Government

An expatriate with a marked lack of American accent came to a momentary stop and unburdened himself as follows:

"Returning to this country after an absence of some years one is struck by two changes in the general scheme. First is the convenient size of the new currency whereby a few dollars in the pocket doesn't feel like a wad of newspapers. Secondly, the Liberal administration. Although these changes may not have been contemporaneous it seems to me significant for it used to be that Liberal Government and prosperity were synonymous terms. Now with money more plentiful the new size currency will be a blessing. Correct me if I'm wrong."

Wheels of Chance

Without stopping to be corrected, he continued, "I remember Fredericton twenty years ago as the city of Cyclists. All ages, conditions and both sexes pedaled away. There were boys going like sixty, which was the quaint simile of those days. A mustachioed gallant steered expertly with one hand and lifted his hat to the demure miss rolling in the other direction. Newsboy and merchant, messenger and banker, alike belonged to the great Brotherhood of the Wheel. I saw one old fellow with a fine growth of whiskers wheeling placidly along. I couldn't resist. I yelled, 'Pull up your beard,' and departed around a convenient corner. I still think the advice was sound."

Speed

Never pausing for breath he went on. "I find the tempo of life quickened remarkably here. 'Going like sixty' would be a gross understatement nowadays. Being a simple soul I had often thought longingly of the slow and easy customs of this part of the country. But the truck has replaced the farm wagon, the automobile is pushing the bicycle off the roads furiously and a contract is played instead of mild whist, and one no longer needs a doctor's prescription to get a little wine for his stomach's sake. It is all too fast. Pardon these tears."

And the expatriate hastened away
