Heralds of Empire

A Daily Column in Which Is Related Little-Known Deeds of The Heroic Men Who Built The British Empire
By H. M. PAINT

They had ridden into a trap! As the morning mist unrolled before them, the sun glinted on bright armour beneath a forest of lance-points, gay pennons and over all the golden flag of Spain. The whole Spanish army was before them! Or maybe not all, but the greater part. It was enough—it would serve! More than enough for the hundred men at arms and five Hundred English archers in the advance scouting party of the Black Prince. As they glanced behind them they beheld more enemies emerging from the pass by which they had entered the valley. The door was bolted and barred! They were living on borrowed time—an hour yet—or maybe two!

It was twenty years after Crecy. The Black Prince had been persuaded by Pedro the Cruel of Spain to reseat him upon the throne of Castile usurped by his half brother Henry.

So the English army had wound through the Pyrenees and drawn near to Castile's hastily summoned levies. And they had been sent out to find the enemy, and had stumbled into a baited trap!

In the centre of the valley a hill rose like a wedge laid upon its side, sheer at both sides and the rear, but sloping up from the plain in a gradual incline to a small flat plateau at its summit. The slope was rough and boulder-strewn, giving good cover, difficult for a charge of mounted men. A good place to die, for there was no quarter to be expected from the fierce Spanish chivalry for marauding Englishmen! Three sides were covered. They would defend the fourth as long as they drew breath.

In good order they gained the summit of the hill, as the Spaniards rolled forward to its foot in a dark and ominous tide, silent and sure of their prey. Setting their pointed stakes in the ground before them, the British archers strung their bows, loosened the arrows in their quivers and awaited the attack.

The impetuous Spanish knights, eager for distinction, spurred on their chargers and surged up the boulder strewn hillside to their ruin. For when they had reached the half-way mark, the bowmen raised a loud shout, took one step forward and drew their bows to the ear. Through breast plate and harness flew the cloth yard shafts as horse and man went down together in a tangled mass that rose breast high in a grim barricade across the hillside.

It was enough. The cavalry withdrew, and wave after wave of men-at-arms ascended the hill to the attack.

For a while they fared no better. Each attack wavered and died away short of the summit, while the grey hillside grew black with Spanish dead.

But at last the British bowmen stood motionless. There were no more arrows!

With a shout of triumph the Spaniards came on once again. The British men-at-arms advanced and drew a thin line across the brow of the hill. The archers threw away their bows. They would never draw them again. But their swords came eagerly into play instead. For a while the thin line held; but at last the Spaniards by sheer weight of numbers won their way to the brow of the hill and on to the plateau.

For a space of time the dreadful melee endured for the English died hard. A last little knot made their stand, with their backs to a giant boulder, so that for a few minutes they held Death at bay.

A last desperate flurry of flashing steel—and then the Spanish tide rolled over the spot. A strange quiet fell as the echoes of the combat ceased to reverberate against the valley's mountain walls.

To this day the hill is called by Spaniards "Englishmen's Hill." Nearby the English won the battle of Vittorio in Wellington's day. For a day, Englishmen held the hill once again, against French assaults as gallantly as the Black Prince's men, and died as hard.

It might well be a place of pilgrimage for many brave Englishmen sleep far from their homes, on the grey and barren slope of "Englishmen's Hill."

MR. PICOBAC'S CRONIES

PRESENTING LES SHARPLES, PROPRIETOR OF THE ONLY AND ORIGINAL TWO-CHAIR BARBER SHOP IN ESSEX CENTRE.

"Listen, Mr. Picobac."

said Les

Razor in hand, Les Sharples, proud proprietor of the original two-chair barber shop of Essex Centre, paused and declared, "Nobody trusts a mugwump. You never know which side of the fence he is on."

"I'm not talking about mugwumps," replied Mr. Picobac brushing the blue smoke aside. "I'm talking about keeping an open mind. An M.P. should vote and smoke as his conscience guides."

"You always smoke the same kind of tobacco, I notice," continued Les.

"You bet I do," rejoined the Burley philosopher. "I smoke Picobac, the pick of Canada's Burley Crop, grown in Sunny Southern Ontario. I like a mild . . . cool . . . sweet smoke. The more I smoke it, the better I like it. But I'm open-minded. You show me anything better and I'll try it; but you can't do it."
