STARS OF THE AIR

JOAN BLAINE (Actress)
Joan Blaine, dramatic actress, plays the title role in "The Story of Mary Marlin" serial on CBS.

Born in Fort Dodge, Iowa, April 22. Great-great-granddaughter of famous American statesman, James G. Blaine. Educated at Fort Dodge schools, Northwestern University where she studied law, and Columbia University New York City, mainly on scholarships she won.

Childhood ambition to be an actress was encouraged by parents. Made professional debut at 12 in home town play, reciting a poem for $3.00.

First extensive professional experience was as concert singer and harpist. Made appearances from coast to coast during three-year period.

Following some work in stock in Philadelphia and at Berkshire Playhouse, played a number of Broadway leads and made a movie with Violet Heming and Lionel Atwill.

Made radio debut at Medford Hillside, Boston, 1930. CBS debut 1931 with David Ross.

Says she still has mike fright.

Writes extensively. Has had a novelette, six short stories and several poems published.

When she retires, would like to live in the country and devote entire time to writing.

Favorite sports are swimming, hiking and mountain climbing.

Is unmarried and lives with her mother, whom she considers her best critic and greatest aid in her radio work.

VITAL STATISTICS: Weight, 115; height, 5 feet six inches; has dark brown hair and blue eyes.

Down-East Village

It is pleasant, in the gathering shadows of the late afternoon, to walk up the broad, elm-lined streets that ascend from the riverside.

The branches of the centuries-old trees are entwined far overhead, like the fingers of companions who have grown inseparable after many summers and winters side by side. And they overhang the shingled roofs of the four-square Georgian mansions as if, too, they would guard these homes they have known so long. In the green foliage, the melodies of the birds of evening blend in a symphony of peace into which few other sounds intrude themselves, here at the threshold of the summer evening.

You come after a while to the summit of the ridge. From there, the village on its gently sloping hillside lies before you, and on the river's farther side, white farmsteads crown the distant ridge and their lush meadows descend to the winding stream. The sound of a distant bell drifts across to you on the blossom-scented evening air, as the well-fed cattle wander slowly toward their shelter. Here and there a wreath of blue smoke hovers above a farmhouse chimney and then drifts slowly away down the valley.

The river, serenely smooth, and clear as a bit of perfect jade, reflects the uneven outlines of the old houses along the wharves, those wharves, where once world-roving ships lay to discharge cargoes from exotic ports, and distant seas. And in mid-stream, last reminder of the brave days of sail, lie one or two lumber-laden schooners, their reflection in the placid water clear as the reality and seeming to suspend them in mid-air. Cumber-some and weather-scarred, they have lingered a little beyond the passing of their day, and you look upon them with the tenderly sympathetic respect that is the desert of unyielding years.

The long summer twilight deepens, and in the west, beyond the farthest hills, the afterglow slowly dims. Lights gleam in the farm homes that sit in serene contentment beside the river. In the venerable mansions of the seafarers on this side, those homes of the far voyagers of China-clipper days, ancient sea-lanterns burn dimly over fan-lighted doorways, as if still keeping aflame the inextinguishable Yankee tradition of the sea.

Through these old Maine towns leads the road to yesterday. You may follow it by river or you may travel it by the winding highway that runs eastward toward the sunrise. You will find it a tranquil road, and the days that you are upon it will be full of peace. The atmosphere of an older and quieter era hovers over it; and the fadeless memories of the men who fixed the bounds of empire lend it picturesqueness and romance.

The old towns with their noble homes which seem to bid you give a thought still to the rugged days that gave them being and to the high integrity of their builders, with their streets of trade along the river or beside the sea, with their arboring and protecting forest of elms, ancient but forever youthful, with their simply living folk of kindly word and good intent, all are part of the life of another day, here in this down-east land.
