Outbreak of Cutworms Is General in N.B.

freely than small ones and hence are easier to destroy.

There is the possibility that the cutworms as a group may be abundant next year. If gardeners and growers of crops who have had losses this year can give some attention to prevention this autumn, they can aid in reducing the numbers for next season.

Most of the injurious cutworms fly in August and early September and lay their eggs on something above ground—grass, weeds, sticks, bushes. If sod land intended for crop next year can be ploughed as soon as possible after hay is cut and then harrowed occasionally in autumn to keep down grass and weed growth, conditions are made unfavourable for egg-laying and for the feeding of young caterpillars.

In gardens, the removal and destruction of crop refuse, old pea vines, beet tops, etc., just as soon as the useful part of the crop has been harvested, is a protective measure. In autumn, all crop refuse should be destroyed; also the weeds about the margin of the garden. The soil should be ploughed or spaded in autumn with burial of all debris which may afford winter shelter for the cutworms. Where it can be done the burning over of weed patches in waste land near gardens is also a preventive measure. The general effort should be towards eliminating winter shelter for the cutworms and permitting the freezing and thawing of winter weather to have full effect in reducing their numbers. A cultural control based on a short crop rotation of grain followed by four years of grass seems promising for keeping down this insect. and neither is clover, so badly infested and neither is clover, so badly infested areas can be safely planted with these crops.

The Al G. Barnes is carrying with it this season the world's largest traveling zoo. Many new, rare, and costly specimens of the wild animal kingdom have been gathered together and they will all be found housed under one great menagerie tent and can be seen on the way into the main tent with the same admission ticket that entitles the holder to see this great circus.

The wonder spectacle of all time, The Fiesta of the Rio Grande, is used this season as a prelude to the circus proper. Scores and scores of men, women, horses, camels, and elephants will take part in this extravagant production. The wardrobe is costly and lavish, the girls are picked from the beauties of Hollywood, and the trained wild animals used in this great spectacle have been trained all through the winter by such notable animal
