STAY OUT OF THE CABIN

A danger that cannot be overestimated on a small boat is that of going into a cabin, especially a closed wooden one, in a squall. More than one person has lost his life by being caught like a rat in a sewer in a tight cabin when the boat capsized. The newspapers point this moral forcibly, for a summer seldom goes by without several accounts of persons drowned in the cabins of capsized boats.

A WAIF'S FORTUNES

She cried herself to sleep at last; and forgot all her troubles for a while; and even when the rain fell down on her she did not wake.

The morning dawned fair and sunny and the rain in the night had only caused the gardens around Gerome Delarieux's house to appear more fresh and lovely.

Bletchley knew him as an eccentric recluse and a woman-hater. The world which took an interest in such matters knew him as a sculptor of genius, and as a brilliant, if somewhat perplexing, personality.

He was but seven-and-thirty; but his fame was of long standing, and his life had been so full of interest and variety that it seemed long to look back upon it. It was seven or eight years since he had come to his present abode; but he was still an object of that keen interest which springs from mystery to his neighbors.

He made no friends in the neighborhood. Visitors of his own set came to see him—men always. With the exception of his housekeeper—an old Frenchwoman who could never have possessed any personal charms even in youth—all his servants were men.

But somehow Bletchley folk soon found food for gossip. The splendor of the house, built like an Italian villa; the extravagance of the entertainments Delarieux gave to his friends; the recklessness of his life during the periods when he was absent abroad, were all discussed; though now they came to be known to the frequenters of Bletchley tea-tables was a mystery.

In the early morning, Gerome Delarieux went out into his gardens, revealing, artist-like, in the loveliness of the new day.

He was a slenderly-built man, taller than Frenchmen as a rule. There was a fire that told of southern blood in his dark eyes, but it was tempered by melancholy. He was striking-looking rather than handsome, with the brow of a dreamer and the lips of a cynic.

His eyes lost nothing of the loveliness around him, from the mystic glory of the east to the gleam of the early sunlight on the still wet grass. His gardens were laid out according to his own poetic fancies, and only the peaceful country could be seen from them. There was nothing to jar upon the pastoral harmony.

Gerome Delarieux turned into the shrubby walks; and there, quite suddenly, he was startled from his reverie.

On the grass, under the trees, the raggedly-dressed girl was still lying fast asleep; the shaggy puppy curled up in the hollow of her arm.

A tramp, who had crept into his grounds for refuge, was Delarieux's first thought; but the girl's extreme youth and utter helplessness appealed at once to his pity, woman-hater as he was said to be.

As he stood looking down at her, he saw what few had seen as yet, that she was very beautiful. The perfect symmetry of the thin figure was revealed, for, drenched with rain, the poor garments clung closely about it; and the features, pale and pinched, had yet such delicate perfection as a sculptor might have chiselled.

Her old straw hat had fallen off, and her hair was damp and dishevelled. Even in sleep her face was troubled.

Delarieux bent over her and shook her gently, and she woke with an inarticulate murmur that somehow told him she was accustomed to be awakened roughly—to meet harsh treatment.

"Get up, my child," he said gently. "You will catch your death if you lie there in your wet clothes."

She looked into his face in wonder; and he saw the most beautiful pair of eyes he had ever beheld—eyes of a wonderful deep clear blue, like sapphires.

"You need not be afraid," he went on. "I'm not angry with you. Tell me how you came here. To whom do you belong?"

The girl burst into tears at the kind tone. All her troubles had come back to her.

"I don't belong to nobody now," she sobbed. "Father's in prison and father's wife turned me out of doors; and I came to find a woman as used to be my mother's friend; and she's gone to America."

She began to shiver violently, whether with chill or agitation Delarieux could not tell. It was no time for questioning. The girl had need of a woman's care and she should have it.

"Come with me," he said.

"Please, sir, if you'd give Jacky something to eat—" she pleaded, "he's very hungry."

She spoke as one familiar with hunger, Delarieux felt.

"He shall have as much as he can eat," he promised, helping the girl to rise.

Her limbs were so stiff and painful that she could hardly move. She felt very ill; too ill to do anything but submit to the care of this gentleman, who seemed to her as some demi-god in his goodness to her as she went through the gardens supported by him.

He led her up some steps and through glass doors into a room that faint and weak as she was, amazed her by its beauty.

"Please, sir, no. I ain't fit," she said, feebly resisting when he would have put her into a great easy chair.

His only response was "Nonsense!" and she sank back on the velvet cushions, wondering at the strange fortune that has befallen her.

As he left her, she looked around at frescoed walls and silken hangings; at all the beautiful objects whose value she knew nothing of; but which, blended for her into one harmonious whole, gave her the impression of having strayed into the palace of a king.

Even into her sordid life some child-like fancies had entered. The dim memory of fairy tales, heard long ago, returned to her. Only in fairy tales had she imagined places like this; and few mortal men could be as this stranger, with the kind, sad eyes, and the gentle, white hands.

A STARTLING CHARGE

Charges in plenty are hurtling through the air in Manitoba, which is now in the throes of perhaps the hottest and bitterest political campaign in its history.

Premier Roblin has been charged with graft and many and diverse offences are being laid at the door of his administration. But perhaps the most startling arraignment of all is that of the Attorney General's Department.

Speaking of Attorney General Campbell Mr. R. A. Bonnar, K. C., of Winnipeg says: "The halls of justice have been and are being defiled

"in the Province of Manitoba. I know what I am talking about, and you all know that I am in a position to know. I say that you "may be as innocent as the child unborn, and yet be prosecuted as justice is administered by the Attorney-General's Department of "the Attorney-General is the rottenest Department in Canada or in any country in this world. It is a

"disgrace to civilization." This is a pretty severe accusation and having been made on the authority of an eminent barrister, it doubtless has some foundation in fact.

If Hon. Colin Campbell can be elected with this indictment hanging over his head it would appear that the people of Manitoba like to have justice administered in that way. No other explanation would seem to be possible.

Loss of voice is a very common complaint among canaries, caused often by taking cold while moulting. First give a drop or two of castor oil, then put a small teaspoonful of gum arabic the size of a pea, and glycerine in the water, a piece of twenty drops of paregoric, and a dust of cayenne mixed with grated egg in its feeding tin. To give the castor oil open the bird's beak very gently with a small stick and drop in the oil. Avoid hanging your cage in draughty places.

CHILDREN'S DRESS.

Paris Pattern No. 3288

All Seams Allowed.

To dress little children is one of the easy and pleasant parts of a mother's tasks. It is a good way to learn a very useful art. We show in the accompanying picture an exceptional style for smaller girls. This dress is made with a yoke and this yoke has a fancy outline at its lower edge, being cut away in two points which slant upward. From the pointed portion of the yoke extend two small box plaits, which extend the entire length of the dress. At each side of these box plaits are a number of small tucks to supply the fullness needed. In the back of the dress there is no yoke at all, but on each side of the waist are tucks, stitched down their entire length. The small skirt is gathered and sewed to the waist from the box plaits to the center of the back, where the closing is arranged. This little frock will be sweet in lawn, gingham, challis or any of the mercerized cottons. The pattern is cut in sizes 2 to 8 years. To make the dress in the 4-year size will require 2 1/2 yards of material 36 inches wide, with 2 1/2 yards of insertion, 1 1/2 yards of edging and 1 yard of beading if trimmed as illustrated.

Price of pattern, 10 cents.

If a piece of furniture has been knocked the dent may be removed by first applying warm water to it, then placing several thicknesses of brown paper which has been soaked in warm water to it, then placing several thicknesses of brown paper which has been soaked in warm water on it, and lastly holding a warm iron to the paper until the moisture is absorbed. If necessary this process should be repeated, and the dent will disappear.
