THE ARROWS OF FATE

Then, at sight of her tears, he continued:

"I know, I know; it has been a long, wearisome waiting. Think, Margaret, four years! But it's all over now, and we will be married as soon as possible, and go out again together."

"But I'm not—I'm not!"

"Not what, dear? Not ready to come yet? Perhaps not, but that won't take long, will it?"

At that the words stuck in her throat like sobs, and would come no farther.

When Gilbert left the house he was troubled.

Margaret had changed—perhaps not much in appearance, but subtly in manner and personality. She was not the same. What could have caused the change, he wondered? There was no alteration in her affections, certainly, or he would have known.

Flossie went so her sister, and sobbed, and vowed that Margaret must clear the matter up—she could not; and she would go away the next day—she would not see him again.

Margaret made her tell all that had happened, and she listened with flushed cheeks and dilating eyes.

But now it was even more difficult than before to put matters straight. How could she go to him and say:

"You are mistaken, Gilbert; it is not the charming girl whom yesterday you kissed, but I am the real Margaret. I, withered and ravaged by disease, thin and nervous, am the real sweetheart you came back to see."

No—no, she could not do it—it was too much. It would break her heart. She implored her sister to go on for a few days—she would think of a plan; or, perhaps, in a day or two the tangle would unravel itself.

And Flossie loved her sister—enough to sacrifice herself. So she saw him again the following day, and for nearly a week the deception went on. Gilbert daily came to see her, and urged her to make ready for the wedding.

Twice Margaret saw him from behind curtains. But these were days of trouble also for Gilbert. He did not understand what the difference was, but there was a change. He or she—at any rate, they no longer looked together at things, as they had before he went away.

He could not blame Margaret. She was the same loveable and charming girl—of that he had no doubt—but she was not the Maggie of old.

She seemed to flinch now from the life she had so looked forward to, and he—he did not contemplate it with half the ardor he had felt; even when on his way to England a few days ago. What was it that was out of joint?

It might well be that it was himself whose ideas had undergone a change under in the South. And yet he felt no such transformation. Of course, four years do work differences in many things, and after being so long accustomed to the fact that her lover was far away beyond touch or sound, she must now be allowed time to get used to the new state of things.

Yes, time might find a way. So they all thought, and Gilbert waited while two more days went by.

Then he decided that he would go and talk to the girl. Perhaps an explanation was necessary; perhaps, in that long period of separation, misunderstandings had cropped up. He would go and have a long talk with her, and let her understand clearly what manner of man he was now.

He would ask her to tell him frankly if she still wished to keep the promise she made him before he sailed away; and if not, they would part—friends, but with an abiding remorse that he had left things so "drift."

Gilbert went to the house earlier than usual, and was shown by the maid into the small front room. He entered very quietly, and as he did so could see straight through a pair of half-open doors into a back parlour.

The young man's heart stood still, and then went on with a tumultuous bound, like a flood that has broken a dam. For in that back room sat a solitary, sad figure, with head bowed over some work that lay in her lap.

Gilbert knew that bowed head—better than the one he had seen so often during the last week. The chestnut coil—it was no coil now, but short ends, not without beauty still.

He knew the figure and the hands; he could not see the face yet—but he knew that this was Margaret.

What did it mean? He stood at the door, irresolute, idiotic.

She looked up. The face was Margaret's, though how changed, and Gilbert saw in a flash what had worked the transformation. Fool that he was not to have known before!

At the same instant she saw him, and rose hurriedly.

He advanced to her with hands outstretched, unable to say a word, but with a great spasm of passion and tenderness choking him.

She blushed, stammered; then whispered, brokenly:

"Gilbert!"

"Margaret!" he cried; "what does it mean?"

She could not explain just then, but he took her hands and kissed them, and covered her face with kisses. "Ugly," as it was, and her eyes, that were the same, but brighter now with tears, and her hair.

Her sister looked in quietly, and saw what had happened and, with a strange feeling in her throat, crept away.

On the voyage out again, a week or two later, nobody on board the Wakiriki was so popular or so liked as young Mrs. Gilbert Fenton, and nobody ever noticed that she was ugly. The End.

MAKES HAIR GROW

Central Pharmacy has an invigorator that will grow hair or money back.

The time to take care of your hair is when you have hair to take care of.

If your hair is getting thin, gradually falling out, it cannot be long before the spot appears.

The greatest remedy to stop the hair from falling out is SALVIA, first discovered in England SALVIA furnishes nourishment to the hair roots and acts so quickly that people are amazed.

And remember it destroys the Dan druff germ, the little pest that saps the life that should go to the hair from the roots.

SALVIA is sold by A. J. Ryan under a positive guarantee to cure Dandruff, stop Falling Hair and Itching scalp in ten days, or money back. A large bottle costs 50c. The word "SALVIA" (Latin for sage) is on every bottle.

BIG GAME SEASON CLOSES THIS WEEK

(Newcastle Leader)

Mr. Dennis P. Doyle, chief game warden of the counties of Northumberland, Gloucester and Restigouche, returned to Newcastle on the local express on Wednesday. Mr. Doyle has been looking over conditions in Gloucester, visiting Bgthurst, Shipigan, Caraque and other places. Mr. Doyle informed The Leader that the big game season would close on Thursday next, December 1st. He said the season had been a most successful one from every standpoint.

Mr. R. S. Gremley and Mr. J. P. Whalen agree with Mr. Doyle that the 1910 season was a fine one. They say the sportsmen had phenomenal luck. Countless moose, caribou and deer were secured. The open season brought hundreds of sportsmen to the Miramichi woods and the favorite hunting grounds were in the past few months brought most prominently to the front.
