A WAIF'S FORTUNES

"Oh, yes, sir. But—to stay with you—to live here always!"

"For the present, at any rate. And always I mean to take care of you, Rosalie. You shall never go back to that horrible slum life. You shall be a happy child if I can make you so."

The tears of gratitude welled up in her eyes. She wanted to kneel at his feet and kiss his hands. All her child's heart went out to him in adoring love.

"And I can't do nothing for you," she said.

"Yes, you can, Rosalie. You can please me in all sorts of ways."

"Can I, sir?"

"You can get well to begin with. That's what I want most of all. And you can put all those unhappy memories away from you. And, by and by, when you are strong enough, you can let me copy that lovely little head of yours in marble."

"I don't understand, sir."

When he had explained to her what he meant her delight was unbounded, and to please her he exaggerated the value of her services, though he was genuinely anxious to begin the work he talked of.

This first day he was gratified by her readiness to adapt herself to his plans, and as the days of her convalescence went by he was confirmed in his impression that her former life was as a dream to her.

She had come into surroundings entirely new to her and to people who seemed to her as beings of another world to that she had left, and she was almost as ready to receive new impressions and as full of wonder at the beauty of the world she had awakened to as Galatea, fresh changed from a marble image to a living girl.

A greater contrast than the lot of Rose, of the Portsmouth slum, and Rosalie, the pet of a wealthy and eccentric man, could scarcely be imagined.

As soon as might be, Delarieux had the professional nurse sent away, and his curious household resumed almost the former routine.

Rosalie shared Margot's rooms, but Delarieux would often send for her, and they would walk in the garden together or sit in his studio.

Girls with wider experience than Rosalie would have found much to marvel at in the house which was now her home.

It was the retreat of an artist who had lavished wealth and thought upon it. Every room was a triumph of art. Everything one touched or saw was a thing of beauty.

At first Delarieux had seen in Rosalie only a neglected child of singular loveliness; but as she grew stronger and her mind unfolded under the influence of her environment, like a flower transplanted to congenial soil, he was touched anew, for hers was a beauty-loving soul that had been starved of its greatest needs; an eager mind, ready to learn all he could teach.

She was very ignorant; yet sometimes, when he half checked himself, imagining that he was talking of things beyond her comprehension, she would startle him by some remarks that revealed her quickness to grasp his meaning.

It was a strange friendship, this, between the embittered, world-weary, cultured man of middle age and the mere child of fourteen whose half-forgotten past had been full of deprivations.

Yet each found in the other the recompense for what had been denied. The heart of each had need of love. In Delarieux Rosalie found the ideal of protecting fatherhood, unconsciously formed in the sad days gone by, and with her the warped mind of the man went back to tender dreams that life had never realized for him.

He had loved once, as but few can love, and one woman's faithlessness had destroyed his faith in all.

But this child, Rosalie, could not deceive. She was just a helpless, tender creature whom he had rescued from want and hardships, and it might be from worse evil in time to come.

Old Margot, who adored her master looked on well pleased. This child was come to bring sunshine into the gloom of Delarieux's life, she was assured, and to Rosalie she would sing his praises from morning till night.

The girl had no need of such lessons. She seemed to exist solely for the man whom she fondly called "her master." Her sole aim was to please him, to whom she owed so much.

She learned to correct the errors of speech that jarred on him. She quickly acquired a more refined accent, and she adapted herself with surprising ease to her new surroundings.

She never went beyond the grounds and Margot and Delarieux were her only companions, but it never entered her head to wish for any others.

All Delarieux's servants treated her with deference, as if she had been his daughter, instead of a waif dependent upon his charity. She was clothed daintily in accordance with his artistic fancies, and he had two rooms adapted for her use and set apart for her.

To him she seemed indeed as Galatea newly awakened to life. He did his best to obliterate entirely all former impressions; he surrounded her with beauty and taught her only from his happier experiences.

He chose the books she read, he told her only of the loveliness he had seen in foreign lands, and the pictures that adorned his house were all of scenes and forms of ideal beauty; there were none to awaken painful thoughts.

For some years past Delarieux had used only a male model, an Italian, who was one of his servants, but he soon began to take casts of Rosalie's lovely little hands and feet, and he began a bust of the exquisite, pathetic child's head.

She was never quite so happy as when she was serving him in this manner, and she longed to recover her former looks that she might the better please him. There was no dawning vanity in this, only innocent delight in the possession of what could be of service to her adored master.

Grief was in store for Rosalie, however, for Delarieux was called away to Italy, to the bedside of an old friend who was very ill.

He was absent during the winter months in attendance on his friend, and Rosalie was left to dreams of him and longing for his return.
