FOR SPORTSMEN

I have been appointed a vendor of game licenses for the New Brunswick Government, and will have licenses for sale on and after the morning of September 15th. I want resident and non-resident sportsmen to buy their licenses from me and I guarantee all a square deal. In addition to licenses I can fit sportsmen out with supplies for a hunting trip, and I can tell you where to go to get the game. I have a full camp equipment, which I will rent at a reasonable price. I can furnish you with lunches at short notice. If you want a lunch put up, just notify me. Patronize a brother sportsman who knows the game and you will be satisfied.

A HOLIDAY ROMANCE

BY MRS. WELLESLEY-SMITH

"Indeed we have"—heartily. "Where are you going?"—as Janet began to replace the shady straw hat she had taken off an hour before.

"No time like the present. I'm going to sell my ancestor before I sleep tonight. Are you coming with me?" "I suppose I had better," returned the elder woman; "but I do wish you would be persuaded."

Ten minutes later the two were walking quickly up the Strand in the direction of Charing Cross.

It was still very warm, and the streets were crowded.
"I am going to Bond Street," Janet announced—"to the shop where I saw the other miniature."

"Suppose they won't buy yours?" "Then I'll try elsewhere," was the undaunted answer.

Passing the Charlton, she glanced a little enviously at two well-dressed women entering a beautifully-appointed motor.

"It must be nice to be rich," she murmured.
"Very," agreed Sally, "but I dare say that there are drawbacks even to wealth."

"I wonder," the other girl said gravely. "It hardly seems likely though. All our worries are caused by lack of money; and see what a blunting effect it has on the daintiness of life—when a dingy tablecloth represents a clear save of three pence a week, it is almost endurable!" Sally opened her eyes in amazement.

"Why, Janet," she cried. "I have never known you so bitter. What is the matter?"

"I want a change of air, I think," Janet said, rather wearily. "I am so tired of the everlasting sameness of things. Come, this is the shop, but the miniature has vanished. Sold, I suppose. All the better; they will be more likely to buy mine—for sell it I must and will."

They entered the cool, rather dim shop, and a well-dressed youth came forward instantly.

Janet went direct to the point, as was her custom.

"I want to sell this," she said. "Will you buy it?"

The young man looked doubtful.
"I must ask Mr. Abrams," he said evasively. "There is not a great sale for such things."

"Then perhaps you could tell me where I could best dispose of it," Janet persisted briskly.

He examined the trinket closely.
"It is not as though it was some notable person—Napoleon, or, say, the Duke of Wellington," he observed wisely, as he vanished in the direction of an inner room.

Janet, glancing serenely around her met the intent gaze of a handsome, middle-aged woman, dressed in a pale shade of gray that went admirably with her elaborately-arranged white hair. She seemed far more interested in Janet than in the selecting of a bracelet from the glittering and costly array spread before her on the glass-topped counter.

"I have been told that it is bad manners to stare!" muttered Sally, under her breath. "That woman seems unable to take her eyes off you!"

Janet laughed.
"A cat may look at a king," she said, carelessly. "I'm not she awfully picturesquely, although she is quite old?"

"Yes. I don't think I like her face though," Sally objected.

The young man returned at that moment.

"Mr. Abrams has no use for the article, madam, but he will give you ten pounds for the pearls. They are quite good ones."

"Ten pounds!" echoed Janet. "Oh, no! I could not think of accepting that!"

"I am sorry, madam! That is the utmost we can offer you"—suavely.

"You'd better give up all idea of selling it!" whispered Sally.

Before Janet could answer, the woman in grey moved towards them.

"I could not help overhearing your conversation," she said, with a perfect, well-bred ease of the woman of the world. "May I look at the miniature? I am collecting them"—smiling graciously.

"Certainly!" Janet returned politely. "I cannot help thinking that it is worth more than ten pounds, which is all they will offer me."

"For the pearls alone, madam," interrupted the young man, politely interested.

The lady took the miniature, and looked from it to Janet—a quick, penetrating glance that made the girl blush.

"Are you thinking that there is a resemblance between myself and my unknown ancestor?" she asked.

"Is it an ancestor?" demanded the elder woman.

Sally detected an undertone of some thing like uneasiness in her quiet voice.

"I have no idea. I concluded so from the likeness to myself," Janet explained.

"I see no likeness whatever," was the grave answer.

"Surely you must!" put in Sally.

"It is most obvious!"
"Not to me"—with polite indifference. "The miniature is well painted. I flatter myself that I am a judge of such matters. I will give you thirty pounds for it!"

The young man behind the counter hid with a smile the chagrin he felt at being done out of a bargain. The pearls alone were worth more than double that amount. Mr. Abrams had not foreseen possible competition, or he would doubtless have offered more to the pretty but plainly dressed girl he had scrutinized with hawk-like, calculating eyes from behind the privacy of a silk curtain.

Janet checked an exclamation of pleasure.

"I will take thirty pounds!" she said decidedly.

"Very well! Wait a minute, please!" the purchaser said impatiently.

I have a few shares of stock of the United Butchers' Supply Corporation, under the laws of Commonwealth of Massachusetts and doing a daily cash business. I believe this stock will pay dividends of more than 10 per cent. on every dollar you invest in it. The corporation owns and controls valuable patents. The reason it is placing this stock on the market is to increase the factory space and present capacity.
