THE LESSON OF LIFE

She spoke as if he had helped her through mere charity, although, really, she knew that she had formed a very pleasant background for all the other matters of his life, that she had been an incentive to his work, and that he had had much comfort out of his feeling of responsibility. She was strongly enough impelled to her action, for her emotions had been stirred to unguessed depths that day—and he would not see!

She knew now—knew definitely and absolutely—that she was in love with him, and that she would never be in love with anybody else; but she was willing to risk disgusting him, and thus losing all chance of ever winning him, simply because she had been wearied beyond endurance by his paternalism. She was not averse, for the moment, to shocking him or even hurting him. She felt that the existing situation was utterly unendurable. Oh, how she hoped that underneath his shell of guardianship there was a warmer feeling!

If there was, she wished to know it, and so taste what she felt would be the limit of all human happiness. If there was not, she wished to know it, so that she could—she said this in her thoughts with agonizing bitterness—so that she could die!

She mused on about her gratitude, and about the common justice of relieving him, by marrying the drug clerk, of further strain.

He waved all that away with an impatient gesture.

"But—but do you want to marry him, Bat?" he asked.

It delighted her to recognize pain-vibrations in his voice. She also felt the instinctive delicacy with which he refrained from expressing deep disgust.

"If I should hear him expressing such incredible silliness as I have just been claiming," she pondered, "I should scratch his eyes out. But he is afraid that it would hurt my feelings if he should say a word against—against that jumping-jack!"

"Well, Perdue," she said slowly, preternaturally calm in spite of the beating of her heart, "you know I can't always be a burden on you."

He heaved a sigh of great relief.

"Is that all, Bat?" he asked.

She was angry when she saw that she had given him such an easy avenue of escape.

"And I am—" She hesitated. "I might as well lie wildly if I am going to lie at all!" she reflected. "I am—very fond of Mr. Link."

"Yes," said Perdue, with that characteristic consideration for her feelings which, on this occasion, still further infuriated her, "he seems to be a—be a very well-meaning young man—your druggist, but—"

He felt that his remark had been notably inadequate.

"But what?" said Bat.

"Well," said Perdue, slowly, cau-

A friend.—I think, my dear, it would be better and much prettier to have your dress just touching the ground. It is ever so much more graceful, and later on you will be glad that you had it made that length. A wedding gown and reception dress, even for the youngest of matrons should be made long. 2nd. No; it is not necessary for you to arrive before the others. If the gifts are not too bulky take them home yourself. 3rd. Cards of that description are sent after the ceremony has taken place, but the regular invitations generally go out two or three weeks before. Yes, indeed, I will think about you both and wish you every possible happiness, too. Later on we will have a chat on "working together to make a happy home." Are you going to live in Montreal?

Melancholy—Your life certainly seems to have very little pleasure in it. There is one thing, though, you cannot expect to make friends unless you meet them half way. You must do your share, you know, and show them that you are interested in them. No doubt not speaking French well is at the bottom of your trouble. The next time your sister-in-law has friends in, make yourself as agreeable as you know how, they will overlook your mistakes and admire your courage in speaking their language. As long as you know that your brother and his wife are glad to have you remain in the room it would be better to do so than to place yourself altogether and lose all chance of ever making friends. If your brother's partner does not wish to give you his work, do not worry over it, let him do it himself. I would in your place, quietly ignore him, both in the office and on the street. He must be very rude and ignorant person and deserves to be well snubbed. It seems to me the people in that town must live a very shallow and irresponsible life. Work hard at your stenography, become expert and later if conditions do not improve them, then go to some city and strike out for yourself. Let me hear from you again.

tiously—and suffering, although he did not quite know why his pain should be so sharp—"you won't mind if I say that this is just a little sudden, will you?"

"Oh, if he would only strike me!" Bat said to herself.

"I have told him," she remarked to Perdue, with a reckless disregard for the last elements of truth, "that he must pay you cent for cent what you have spent on me before I will—before I'll be his wife."

This hurt Perdue, but at the same time it relieved him a little. He spoke with a glint of humor showing through the deep depression which had settled on him.

"That gives me some leeway," he remarked. "I shall make a very large account of it. I wish I had spent more, so that it would take him longer to pay up!"

Instantly she forced an anger. If she cared to create a Mr. Link to marry, she did not propose to have the imaginary creature insulted in her very presence by such a tone as that!

The criticism of his ability to earn money was so very obvious!

"Oh, said she, 'it won't take him so long, perhaps! Other folks than architects can make a little money, sometimes!'"

"Why," said Perdue, looking at her quickly and wholly mistaking the situation. "I didn't mean to cast a slur on his ability. I can't make much money, and never shall be able to. Why, Link might invent something—a patent medicine or—a hair-dye, or something—which would make as much money in a year as I shall ever make in ten. I didn't mean to say anything against him!"

"Thank you!" said Bat with offended dignity. "My husband will not invent a hair-dye! He would not think of such a thing!"

That closed the conversation, and they drove to the flat in cloudy silence.

PERDUE CHANGES HIS POSITION

The teachers, after they had heard about the episode at the building and had gazed at Perdue in his working-clothes with secret admiration, urged him to stop and dine with them; and because he felt that he must have a talk before that night was over about Mr. Link, he accepted the invitation gladly.

Bat guessed at what he wanted, and she worked desperately to prevent any confidential conversation. She had gone into the pond of falsehood a good deal deeper than she had intended to when she shut her eyes and jumped, and was floundering very sadly in her mental efforts to find some way of getting to the dry land of plain truth again.

Three Doctors Attended Her. Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup Cured Her

It has long been known that the balsamic odor of the newly cut pine tree heals and invigorates the lungs and consumptives improve and revive amid the perfume of the pines. Since but few can command the luxury of a visit to the pines, it will be good news to many to know that the essential healing principle of the pine has been separated, and refined, and combined with other absorbent, expectorant and soothing medicines of recognized worth in the manufacture of Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup.

Mrs. Charles McDermott, Bathurst, N. B., writes: "I thought I would write and let you know the benefit I have received through the use of your Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup. Three years ago I had Consumption and had three doctors attending me, and they were very much alarmed about my condition. I was so weak and miserable I could not do my housework. While looking through your B. B. B. almanac I saw that Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup was good for weak lungs so I got a bottle and after taking ten bottles I was completely cured. At that time I weighed 135 pounds and now weigh 172, a gain of 37 pounds in three years. I now keep it in the house all the time and would not be without it for anything as I owe my life to it." Price 25 cents at all dealers. Manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

If a baby is restless at night, it is a good plan to give him a teaspoonful of water occasionally. Sleeplessness in infancy is often caused by thirst.
