A MILLION A MINUTE

A ROMANCE OF MODERN NEW YORK AND PARIS
BY HUDSON DOUGLAS.

All he had to do now, he thought to himself, lying back in a rickety hack on his way from the station to that hotel which he had elected to honor with his patronage, was to present himself at the address given him by the San Francisco lawyers, to wit, the Misses Winters' select pension, in the Avenue Moreau, and there announce to Miles Quaintance's adopted daughter that he had come thither to marry her. Soon after that there would be millions at his disposal, not fewer than twelve and a half of them counting in francs, and as many more than that as he could possibly make it.

It would be strange if he could not come to such terms with the girl as should leave him his freedom and the lion's share of the spoil. Then he would either promptly divorce her or disappear, as she should prefer. The latter would probably be the more simple method, since he could in that way resume his former identity and so effectually cover his fraudulent tracks.

It also remained to be seen whether, once he had the money safe in hand, he could not tax to good purpose Arendsen's most preposterous claim. The ransom he had been forced to promise that robber was altogether out of the question. Any manoeuvre of that sort would, of course, take very delicate management, but a millionaire might accomplish much that would be impossible to a poor man. His estimate of prospective profits on the present venture had risen to twenty-five millions of francs when he reached the Cours-la-Reine and got out before the Hotel du Palais.

He had decided to put up there for the twofold reason that it was a conventionally correct establishment and at the same time conveniently situated between the Avenue Moreau and his own old haunts in the Ville-Lumier. While he registered he gave the uninterested vestibule to understand that he was someone of importance.

When he arrived it was his firm intention to carry out his mission on the instant. But, by the time he had changed his clothes and otherwise refreshed himself, dusk had come down. And he remembered that the lights in the Rue Royale had already begun to twinkle invitingly as he had passed the Madeleine. It was long since he had set foot in the city of pleasure, and he had lived roughly, at hazard, since then. It would make no appreciable difference if he allowed himself twenty-four hours' liberty first. There would still be time and to spare for all practical purposes.

He turned west instead of east as he left the hotel, in correct evening dress, with his opera-hat at the most rakish of angles, and dined at the Ritz, in the Place Vendôme, where he treated himself royally, without regard to expense, feeling that he was in his true element in its atmosphere of luxury and extravagance. Thence a leisurely stroll, with a good cigar in his lips, took him to the Rue Montpensier, where, at the Palais-Royal, he sat and laughed for an hour or two over a French farce of the broadest.

A hearty supper at Maxim's induced added cheerfulness, and, having learned from a benevolent bystander at the bar there that a whilom resort of his was still doing business at the old stand, he resolved to pay it a surprise visit before returning to his hotel. He considered that it would be most unwise to throw away any chance of increasing his scanty capital, and, while he was in the vein, would just speculate a few francs at the tables on a safe and certain system he had evolved since his last disaster in that direction.

He called a cab and went clattering back to the narrow Rue des Bons Enfants, where it did not take him long to get rid of what cash he had with him. Whereupon he hurried off to the Cours-la-Reine with some muddled idea of returning with what he had left there, and bringing the bank after all, but, at sight of his bed, a providential drowsiness overcame him, and he lay down.

It was nearly noon next day before he awoke, still in crumpled evening clothes, haggard, heavy-eyed, and suffering from an unclean taste in his mouth. He blamed this to the last brandy-and-soda of which he had partaken, at the croupier's invitation, in the Street of the Good Children.

He once more counted his assets, uneasily now, and found them sadly shrunk. And when, after a cold bath and a light breakfast, he at length started for the Misses Winters' select pension, it was under the strong conviction that he had somehow been made a fool of by someone, and

WOMAN A SAVAGE, SAYS DR. MAX BAFF

Boston, May 11.—Dr. Max Baff, a fellow in psychology in Clark College Worcester, and a member of the American Medical Association, says the present day woman is no better than the savage from a psychological point of view.

"Man has outgrown his savage customs of personal adornment with the progress of civilization," says Dr. Baff, "but woman has remained stationary if she has not actually retrograded. Among savages, like the American Indian, for example, both sexes indulge in wearing feathers, painting themselves and attaching rings and useless ornaments to their persons. Men have outgrown these. But look at the woman of today. She loves to wear feathers, stuffed bodies of dead birds, even of barnyard fowls that lack the aesthetic suggestion of the forests and bring to mind only the butcher shop. She pierces her ears that she may hang bits of gold and gleaming stones there, she wears rings and bracelets and necklaces. Her savage love of gaudy colors is another evidence of her lack of advancement. Again, she wears her hair long, arranges it in fantastic shapes, oftentimes made even more grotesque by artificial means. As for painting her face—that is something that everybody knows.

"These are the outer symbols of her savagery, but the physical and psychological differences between men and women are marked. Leaving aside the difference in size and strength and endurance, which are obvious enough, we note that color blindness is rare among savages. Like savages, too, they are prone to religious hysteria. Women are more suggestible than men, and in that same way the woman of our age and time is like the simple savage.

"To do away with clothes as adornment would be a great benefit to women. If they cut their hair as men do, and if they followed the natural manner of putting on garments only when the weather was cold they would be deprived of two great reasons for their mental concentration on the savage pleasures of personal adornment. They might then attempt to advance in civilization a little."

WATERWAY ACROSS EUROPE TO BE DUG

Geneva, May 12.—A waterway through the heart of Europe, joining the North Sea to the Mediterranean and passing through Holland, Germany, Switzerland and France, will be an accomplished fact within the next few years.

The Paris municipality has given the first impetus to the international scheme by deciding to open navigation on the Rhone between Geneva and Marseilles, and has decided to construct a barrage and a parallel canal to the Rhone from Genesiat, an hour's journey by train from Geneva. The work will be commenced this summer and completed in 1913.

The Swiss Association for Navigation from the Rhone to the Rhine has pledged itself to prolong the river route from Geneva to Basle via the lakes of Neuchâtel, Morat and Bienné and River Aar, which flows into the Rhine. The North Sea is already connected with Basle by the Rhine highway.

Luke Pooler, of East Madison, Me., has a horse that for 13 consecutive years made the trip to Skowhegan and back daily, which means a total distance of more than 4000 miles. The horse is now 21 years old.

that he must forthwith exact satisfaction somewhere for such affront. He rang with vicious emphasis the door-bell of the prim dwelling in the Avenue Moreau, and was unnecessarily abrupt with the maid who answered it.

He was left to kick his heels in a stiffly furnished drawing-room for fully ten minutes while the Misses Winters arrayed themselves to receive their visitor. His tone to them when they did appear was the reverse of conciliatory. It made the two elderly maidens nervous.

"I told that stupid girl that I came here to see Miss Quaintance," he said in a brusque, quarrelsome tone, and Miss Sophia looked somewhat blankly at her sister Jane. It was Miss Jane who replied.

"Miss Quaintance is no longer with us, Mr. Quaintance."

Seager stared at her and his astonishment was so evident that Sophia felt called upon to supplement the assertion.

"What my sister Jane says is quite correct. Miss Quaintance is no longer with us," she echoed, looking not unlike a grey parrot with her sublime English features and a peaked cap for crest.

"The deuce she isn't!" Seager gasped, aghast at the grave possibilities opening up.

"Then where is she?"

Miss Jane laid a tremulous hand on Sophia. She was not accustomed to be addressed as though she were a delinquent servant, but, nevertheless, she answered him, in a voice meant to convey the fact to his understanding.

PATTEN TO DEFEND HIS COTTON DEALS

New York, May 11.—James A. Patten, speculator in wheat and cotton, is hurrying here for Chicago to place at the disposal of the United States District Attorney in this circuit all his books and papers and to afford him all the information in his power in respect to the alleged pool to corner cotton. Mr. Patten is expected to reach town this morning.

Mr. Patten holds he has nothing to hide in connection with his dealings. He has never been in any pool, he asserts, and has no intention of cornering or "squeezing" these cotton speculators who have sold something to him they cannot deliver.

But the Government, it is understood, does not exist to find anything illegal in Mr. Patten's purchase of cotton. A man can buy as much of anything as he has a mind to, and can sell it at any price he can get for it without infringing any law. On the other hand if he enters into an agreement by which he in any way restrains trade or interferes with interstate commerce then he can be brought to book, Government holds.

Mr. Patten and his associates made arrangements last summer with certain spinners in the South, it is alleged, to deliver cotton to them at a certain figure. It is this agreement that the Government is investigating to ascertain whether it involves the Anti-Trust law.
