A WAIF'S FORTUNES

The fates were kind, apparently. In a small general shop where she made inquiries the woman expressed willingness to take her in on finding she had money to pay the rent of a room in advance.

It was a miserable little room, not even clean; but Rosalie was so worn out that she paid five shillings for the first week's rent and took possession thankfully. She also paid for coals and other necessities, and soon she was sitting, half dressed, before a smoky fire, drying her damp outer garments and feel strange and desolate.

The revelation of Santry's true character had not only shocked and frightened her but it had filled her with fears never felt before. She shrank from appealing for help to any other friends of old days lest they, too, should prove treacherous. Her only woman friends were Mrs. Annesley and Margot, and both were far away, for Margot had returned to her native country to some relatives there.

Rosalie was forced by sheer necessity to face the situation. She was determined to be independent, and a proud resolution upheld her.

She made her room as clean as she could and spent as little of her money as was possible on bare necessities. The months at Miss Pennington's had been to live through had taught her much, and she was not quite the helpless girl she had been at the time of Gerome Delarieux's death.

She resolved to apply to women artists for employment as a model, and she found out the quarter where painters most congregate and succeeded in interviewing one lady who happened to be sharp of voice and hard of feature.

"Do you sit for the figure?" she asked.

"Oh, no," answered Rosalie, flushing scarlet.

"Then you're no good to me," said the lady with an air of finality.

The next artist Rosalie interviewed was not much more than a girl, and she was kind and sympathetic, but could give no employment just then. She promised to keep Rosalie in mind however, took her name and address, and sent her to some other studios, where there might be a chance.

Rosalie met with no success, however. There was always something that prevented her being engaged. She was too late or too early when the chance existed, and she found that the calling of artists' models is just as overcrowded as most others.

In old days Gerome's friends would have been glad to paint her. She was an outsider now, wandering amongst closed doors, lost in a strange place. The days passed; her money melted with appalling rapidity, and the pros-

UPPER QUEENSBURY.

July 25.—Haying is the chief occupation here at present and despite the unfavorable weather, all are making unusually good progress. The crop here, as well as in other parts, of the country, promises to be a large one.

The many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Hazelton will regret to learn that they are both in very poor health and under the care of Dr. Coffin. We hope for a speedy recovery. Mrs. Hazelton's mother, Mrs. Cyrus Burt, and Mrs. Coburn, of Fredericton, are nursing them at present.

The numerous friends of Bud Greenfield, will be delighted to hear that he is rapidly recovering from the fever-pect of earning more appeared remote indeed.

For the first two weeks she paid her rent in advance. When her landlady appeared on the morning which began the third week she pleaded, trembling for a little grace.

The woman was always gruff in manner, and she did not improve on acquaintance.

"If the money ain't paid tomorrow, out you go," she said, and as she went down the stairs, she expressed her opinion in loud tones for the benefit of the other lodgers concerning people who did not pay their rent.

Rosalie's days were chiefly spent in the fruitless quest for employment. She had not become acquainted with any of the other people in the house, which was just as well for her.

She went out that day, feeling lost and frightened. She was ready to do anything that was honest; but the people at the registry offices looked askance at a girl who could give no references. In all the great city she knew no one to advise or help her.

The history of that day was as many others that had gone before, and she went home when it was growing dark to creep into her comfortless bed and lie there crying.

Then as she clasped her hands in a piteous, child's prayer for help, she felt the ring which Gerome had given her, and a sudden thought came.

There were shops where money could be borrowed on such a valuable article as this. She could not bear to part with it, but she must.

The fear of want and lack of shelter was taken away, and she fell asleep.

But when she woke next morning the ring was gone.

She searched frantically for it, but all in vain, and at last, crying bitter. Dr. Coffin was the physician in charge of his case.

Master Ralph Murray of Campbellton, whose home was destroyed by the recent fire at that place, is now visiting his uncle, Mr. Ernest Hazelton here.

Mrs. S. W. Parent's health is not improving as rapidly as her many friends would wish.

Mr. Geo. Hyde, Sr., and his nieces the Misses Hyde, made a flying trip to Burt's Corner Saturday, calling on relatives and friends.

terly, she made her loss known to the landlady.

"And do you dare to say as I took your brummagem ring?" demanded the woman furiously.

Rosalie stood aghast as a torrent of the vilest language was poured forth upon her. The other lodgers came down on the stairs to listen, but no one took her part.

At length she was literally driven forth with abuse and even blows, and ran in terror from the only shelter she had.

She had been robbed as she slept, she knew, but she did not know where to seek redress. Even such poor belongings as she had bought were left behind her. For days she had been insufficiently fed, and she had not tasted food that morning.

She went on till she reached a public park, and there she entered and sat down on a bench in exhaustion and despair. What was to become of her? Where could she turn? If she had been in fault in leaving the refuge provided for her she was being punished heavily.

The day was cold, though the spring flowers were in bloom in the garden borders. Rosalie shivered in the bleak wind.

She had not even a penny to buy a cup of tea, and she was without a hat or coat. Yet all day long her only places of rest were the benches in the public gardens.

She wandered from one such refuge to another, and when at last the shadows of evening began to fall, she thought with terror of the night.

The child Rosalie had tramped from 100 mouth to Bletchley, sleeping where she could; but the girl Rosalie suffered in a way she had not.
