A HOLIDAY ROMANCE

BY MRS. WELLESLEY-SMITH

"Somenow or other I intend to have a breath of sea air this summer," announced Janet Arderne in a tone of finality, as she entered the tiny sitting-room of the flat she shared with her friend, Sarah Prince.

Meadhall Mansions did not boast a life, and the stairs between the ground floor and what Janet termed "the attic," were many. Flushed and a little breathless, the girl threw herself into the nearest chair, and vigorously used The Daily Mail as a fan.

"I repeat," she went on firmly, "I am going to spend my holidays by the silver sea—and you, Sally, will do the same."

Sally glanced up from her occupation of cutting bread and butter.

"I haven't the slightest objection," she returned; "but where is the money coming from?"

"No idea yet," said Janet, shaking her curly, red-gold head; "but go I must. I positively pine for the sea, and it's three years since I last set eyes on it."

"I'm very much afraid it will be three more," Sarah returned, sighing faintly.

For once the fickle English climate was showing what it could do in the way of a real summer. Day after day the sun blazed down on the London streets, and the top flat of Meadhall Mansions was, in spite of all the girls could do, extremely hot.

The tea-table looked cool and inviting, with its dainty cloth, embroidered by Janet's clever fingers, and inexpensive white china. A few flowers stood in the centre, flanked by a crisp, green lettuce; everything in the room was cheap, but the general effect was attractive in the extreme.

Janet, in spite of her plain home-made grey linen dress, with its spotless cuffs and collar, of fine muslin, was undoubtedly a remarkable looking girl. Tall and slender, with masses of curling, copper-colored hair, unusual sea-green eyes, she was the greatest possible contrast to her friend. For Sally was frankly plain, with what she herself insisted was a "dumpy figure," no complexion to speak of, and nondescript features; her dark hair was already besprinkled with grey, but kindness and good temper beamed from every line of her face, making her a favorite wherever she went.

Sally filled the post of secretary to a city magnate, while Janet toiled in a large girls' school from early morning to late afternoon. Their united earnings sufficed to run the compact little flat, and provide them with the necessities of life, leaving no margin for pleasures or luxuries.

"We deserve a good holiday," opined Janet, as tea proceeded peacefully.

"People go not always get what they deserve," Sally returned sententiously. "We must make up our minds to remain where we are, dear."

"I absolutely decline to do any such thing," Janet's red lips closed firmly. "At the back of my head I've a plan. When we have finished I will tell you what I mean to do."

"I am all curiosity," Sally answered laughingly. "But I warn you, when all our liabilities are discharged faithfully, we shall have exactly two pounds in hand."

"Better than nothing," Janet made an excellent meal, and blithely assisted to clear away and wash.

"Now," she announced, "I'll show you how we're going to have a real holiday. Sit still; I shan't be a minute."

She vanished into their bed room, to return in less than the stipulated time with a small square box in her hand, at sight of which Sally uttered a protesting exclamation.

"Janet, you don't mean—" she began.

"Yes, I do," retorted the girl. "It's not a bit of use talking, my mind is made up."

"Then in that case I may as well be silent," was the dry reply.

"Just as well"—cheerfully.

As she spoke Janet unlocked the box, and carefully tilted its contents on to the table. They were not numerous—a well-worn prayer-book, a small gold thimble, and the miniature of a man in uniform set in pearls.

Picking up the latter, Janet regarded it thoughtfully.

"I saw one today in a shop, not so nice as this, marked twenty pounds," she observed. "I shall sell my unknown ancestor, Sally, and we will have our holiday."

"Don't dream of doing any such thing," urged the sensible, practical Sally; but she might as well have spoken to the winds—Janet could be very obstinate on occasion.

"I have quite decided that a fortnight or three weeks by the sea is more to be desired than the possession of the miniature of some distant relative I've never heard of. I know nothing about my people at all, as a matter of fact, and I only guess that this is an ancestor, because he's really remarkably like your humble servant."

She turned it over; on the plain gold back was engraved the words, "from Cosmo," and the date 1797.

"Did not your mother tell you who it was?" queried Sally, much interested.

"My poor mother was ill for such a long time before she died; I never remember her as anything but an invalid, and I never saw my father."

"How long has your mother been dead?" abruptly.

"Six years. Oh, Sally, the two years after her death, before I met and loved you—I hate to think of them! In spite of the pinch of poverty we've been very happy together in our dear little flat."

PREMIER'S TOUR ENDED
FINAL PLEA FOR UNITY OF EAST AND WEST

Crows Nest, B. C., Aug. 31.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party today concluded their tour of British Columbia with meetings at Cranbrook and Fernie.

In closing his address, at Fernie, Sir Wilfrid took occasion to express his appreciation of the reception accorded him throughout the whole Province, irrespective of party affiliations.

"British Columbia is bigger than I thought when I left Ottawa eight weeks ago," he said. "Your goodness and hospitality have warmed my heart, and will ever be remembered."

At Cranbrook the Premier set the stamp of approval on Malcolm A. MacDonald, the young Liberal who suffered defeat for the provincial legislature at the recent elections. Hon. Mr. Templeman expressed the hope that he would yet be in power in the provincial house.

"I have something better to suggest," observed the Premier. "Let us here and now nominate him as the standard bearer of Liberalism in the next federal campaign."

As a closing word, Sir Wilfrid Laurier counselled the people to hasten the time when less would be heard of east and west, and more of the Dominion as a whole.

ADAMLESS EDEN FOR NEW YORK

New York, Aug. 31.—A whole city block of women, with not a man in sight, will become an interesting reality in the "improved mode of living" in New York City early next year. Prominent New York men and women, who are keenly interested in the housing problem, say the new arrangement will offer accommodations for many hundreds of New York's business and professional women and students who represent the bachelor maid population of the city.

The members of the woman colony, which it is declared will be the only one of its kind in the world, will be housed in two separate buildings.

The buildings when completed will accommodate nearly one thousand women. The only men to be allowed on the premises will be those received socially by the young women guests. Men will be encouraged to make social calls, and provision has been made for this social feature of the club by providing a few dozen of what will be known as "beau parlors." Here young women may receive their friends and no record will be kept of the gas burned. In the new order of things, where women will live under the same unrestrained liberty as the men and women of wealthy clubs, there will be no interfering janitress, no elevator maid, no woman superintendent, or lady night watchman tiptoeing about the halls turning out the gas, as a gentle hint to the young man that he had better be moving.

LABOR DISTURBANCE IN SEATTLE; BUILDING DYNAMITED

Seattle, Wn., Sept. 1.—An attempt to dynamite the new six story building under process of construction at Third Avenue and James Street last night, shattered all the windows within the radius of a block and led to the report that an attempt had been made to rob the Canadian Bank of Commerce adjoining. Two persons passing by the building at the time of the explosion were slightly injured. The police say the attempt to wreck the building was due to labor troubles. One man has been arrested.
