A WAIF'S FORTUNES

(Conclusion.)

"I was a poor, ignorant child. I had been brought up in poverty. My father was in prison when I ran away from my stepmother to try and find a friend of my own mother's. I begged my way from Portsmouth nearly to London, only to find she was gone away. Then a rich man took me into his house, had me nursed through a long illness, gave me kindness and luxury instead of want and harshness. Wilfred, was it any wonder I loved him?"

"No." "I stayed with him. He led a strange, isolated life. I saw no woman except his old housekeeper. Wilfred, I was only fifteen, and I had no mother. I knew only what he taught me, and—and—"

A storm of weeping shook her slender body, and Wilfred started up, pale and with blazing eyes.

"Who was this man? Where is he now?"

"He is dead. He was Gerome Delarieux! After he died—that was before I was seventeen—your mother, Mrs. Annesley, was kind to me, and then—then I knew what I was. Oh, Wilfred, I tried to live it down, but when I loved you and knew I was unworthy— Yet I have never really loved but you. Since Gerome died I have tried to live down the past."

"It is past!" cried Wilfred. "Rosalie, it breaks my heart to think of it, but it is past. Darling, you are still mine."

"Could you love me well enough to forgive?"

"Only trust me for that. I will teach you to forget."

"Ah, Wilfred, you cannot, my dear, my dear! It would never have been the same. Always the shadow must have followed us. I should have seen it, even in your dear eyes. It is better as it is."

"Oh, my love, only live for me!"

"It cannot be. It is not heaven's will," she said, "and I could scarcely choose it now. You can forgive a poor girl who loves you and can bring no wrong on you. You will think of me always with pity, I know. And though I have not lived very long, I have had a great deal of happiness. You must not be sad when you think of me."

He had sunk on his knees beside her and his head was bowed on her lap. She laid her hands on his hair.

"I was happy with Gerome," she said. "Yes, I was! I loved him dearly, and I did not understand there was wrong. I was happy all through those years with Katie when the past seemed buried out of sight. And—ah, those first days of ours together, Wilfred—they were worth living for and dying for! I never knew till then what love may mean. And now you are come to be with me till—till I must go away."

"No! No!"

"I could never have been your wife, but now you love me; and, Wilfred—that other girl who loves you—"

"Rosalie!"

"I have seen her. One night I was near your home. I wanted to have one glimpse of you. And I saw you as I stood by a gateway in a garden. She has a sweet, good face and she loves you."

He knew it was of Meta she must be speaking. "You near, and I never guessed!" he cried.

"Wilfred, I should like you to marry her. Remember, I wished it. You have so many years to live, and she could make you happy."

"Oh, Rosalie, I only want you."

"They are so good to me, Kate and Mr. Hardross. Gerome left a will after all. I don't understand, but Mr. Hardross does. I have no anxiety, I have everything to help me, so you must not grieve, Wilfred. Only if sometimes you could be with me."

He was with her often after this evening, and Kate's fears as to the effect of the agitation upon her was groundless. She even grew a little better for a time, so that Wilfred almost hoped—

But Hardross knew—Hardross who loved her as no other did, who thought of her night and day, and worked for her, making her believe that the money which provided for her needs was her inheritance from Delarieux. Rosalie was not hard to deceive and Kate spoke as Hardross wished.

Rosalie was at peace, with the friends she loved around her, and with Wilfred at her side. She had suffered to bear, but love went with her always.

Mrs. Annesley came to Rome to visit her, and made one often of the little group gathered in the room with its great window looking on the same scene to which the dying eyes of Raphael turned from his own unfinished work when, in the prime of manhood, he left earthly love and friendship behind him.

They were tranquil days, those of the Roman spring, for Rosalie. Even Wilfred subdued his own grief to make them as happy as might be, and when the end came it was peacefully; one evening when the sunset glory lit the western skies.

So life's problems were solved for Rosalie.

"Never more on her Shall sorrow light or shame. She was not made, Through years and moons, the heavier weight to bear, Which colder hearts endure till they are laid By age in earth."

And in the after years Meta and Wilfred were together, but Hardross was alone all his days.

THE END.

THE BROWN TAIL MOTH MUST BE KEPT OUT

Dr. Hewitt of the Dominion Experimental Farm Speaks to the Canadian Horticulturists on this Subject at an Extra Session at St. Catharines, Ont.

St. Catharines, Aug. 13—The Canadian horticulturists today held an extra session to meet Dr. Hewitt of the Dominion Experimental Farm with regard to tariff regulations affecting the importation of plants. Legates having registered a complaint against the present arrangements. Practically every delegate attended the session. Dr. Hewitt explained that the tariff provisions under the destructive insect and pest act were for the best interests of florists, fruit-growers and nurserymen. The San Jose scale act prohibited the importation of stock from the United States. A year ago the prohibition was removed and United States stock was allowed to come in under certain conditions. Fumigation stations were established at six points along the frontier. Now we have the invasion of the brown-tailed moth, and are threatened by the Gypsy moth. It is necessary to take measures for the control of these in Canada not only from the United States but from England and France, where they had appeared.

Last year, through the kind co-operation of nurserymen, the division of entomology was able to inspect European imports and 196 nests of the brown-tailed moth were found, the destruction of which tended to stop the invasion. This year they were able to inspect the stock again. During the importing season nearly two and a half million plants came in and on these 313 nests were found and destroyed. Each nest contained from 200 to 300 caterpillars. The act gave power to inspect, to enter premises suspected, and give an importer compensation in case his stock is destroyed. It became necessary to keep track of European stock and as that could only be done at ports of entry the same ports were chosen as in the case of the San Jose scale act. As most of the stock was imported during the winter it would come in through St. John. It was recently found that stock coming from Japan was liable to be infected and this was put on the same level as European stock.

The point having been raised of roses that were injured by fumigation Dr. Hewitt said that need not be, if the fumigation were done in the dark. Roses grown outside were subject to infection.

A resolution was adopted that the convention is of the opinion that all greenhouse plants and bulbs should be exempt from the act, and should be allowed to come in at any season of the year and that Montreal should be a port of entry and that the Minister of Agriculture should be approached on the subject. A vote of thanks was tendered Dr. Hewitt for his prompt coming and for his kindly consideration of the florists' interests.
