A WAIF'S FORTUNES

"Have you nothing to say, Rose? I trust you are not of a sullen disposition."

"I—I will try—to do as you wish me to," faltered Rosalie.

"You are industrious and painstaking, I hope? We are required to work you know. The night cometh when no man shall work, and you would not wish to be a burden upon the munificence of that dear, charitable lady who desires to save you as a brand from the burning."

"I will do anything I can. I don't want to be a burden on anybody."

"That is not the tone in which you should speak, Rose. Your spirit should be humble and contrite. It shall be my endeavor to bring you to a grateful and submissive state of mind. Go with Mrs. Deacon. She will show you your room."

Rosalie followed the servant, her heart smarting with a sense of wrong and injustice and utter desolation.

She would not cry before those two women, but when Deacon had left her in the cheerless attic, which was the room allotted to her, she gave way to a paroxysm of grief.

She sobbed her lover's name, calling on him to come back to her. As long as she lived she would never be able to see what he had really done. She would only think of the tenderness and indulgence that had made her days pleasant, not of the sin against her helpless youth, the lack of care that had caused her to be cast upon the world utterly unfitted to encounter privation and face alone the blame that should have been his.

Even the hard experience of her childhood had not robbed her of her extreme sensitiveness, and all that was clinging and weak and affectionate in her had been fostered during her life with Gerome Delarieux. She had lain soft, eaten daintily, been waited upon, and tenderly cherished as some previous, delicate blossom of girlhood, that even a rough wind must never touch, and from the fond arms of an adoring guardian and lover, from a house where all had been ready to do her loving service, she was thrust into the cold world.

Margot and the other servants had savings to fall back upon. Rosalie, the one to be most dependent on Delarieux in life, was the worst off at his death.

How she missed Mere Margot, a wicked old woman in clearer eyes than hers, but her devoted nurse in sickness and her most devoted attendant since!

At the villa Rosalie had reigned a little queen. Not only Delarieux, but all the people she had encountered petted and praised her, till it was a wonder that she had not become spoiled.

She knew that she was beautiful, and accepted the fact simply. She had been glad of it because it had pleased Delarieux. But it was not for her beauty that he had loved her. He had called her his sweet, loving child, his joy, his sunshine. There had been no thought of right or wrong in those days. Her one duty had been to please him.

From Mrs. Annesley she had learned meekly and willingly because she had been taught in love, and she realized more and more the truth that it had cost almost as much pain to tell as to hear.

In Miss Pennington's house she was utterly wretched.

She was a delicate girl, and she suffered physically from the deprivation which her new guardian considered wholesome for her and from the fatigue of unaccustomed tasks.

To practice her music and dancing, and to pose in the classic draperies of Gerome's "Innocence" has been the only occupations she had had which could be called work by anyone, and these she had pursued of her own free will, he never allowing her to keep her pose after he had thought she was fatigued.

All was changed now. She had to scrub and clean her own room and to perform whatsoever other household work Mrs. Deacon chose. And she was kept at needlework, which she detested, coarse garments intended for the mission work in which Miss Pennington was engaged.

To do that lady justice she was unable to comprehend, remotely, the suffering of her charge. She was subjecting Rosalie to such discipline as she believed the girl needed, and she forgave, as often people do, to make any allowance for temperament and previous environment.

She worked amongst women of the most depraved type, and was acquainted with vice in its most hideous aspect, and she was hardly to be blamed for her point of view regarding Rosalie.

The girl was to her a waif, who for a while had been living in guilty luxury. She must be made to see the misery which sin leads to and be taught to work.

But Rosalie had been rendered wholly unfit for the tasks imposed upon her, and unfortunately she had an enemy in Mrs. Deacon, whose table she sat, at and at whose mercy she was, in a measure, placed.

Rosalie could not sew till they taught her. She could not scrub and scour to Mrs. Deacon's satisfaction, and she was continually being found fault with.

The tasks imposed upon her were such as many girls would have accomplished with ease, but to her they were hard. A certain amount of sewing was set her to get through, and when it was badly done she was made to unpick it, when she worked slowly, in order to do it well, she was accused of laziness and not allowed to leave off till the amount set for her was finished.

Then Mrs. Deacon was always carrying complaints of her to Miss Pennington. The woman was spiteful and deceitful, and poor Rosalie little more than a hitherto petted child.

At the beginning she was so crushed by sorrow that she submitted despairingly to her fate; but as time went on her spirit, gentle beneath the influence of love, began to rise in rebellion.

Deeply as she had been impressed by Mrs. Annesley's teaching, they could not make her resigned to her fate. Nor could she reconcile the religion of her friend with the grim Calvinistic doctrines preached to her now.

(To Be Continued.)

HINTS FOR THE LADIES

Hands are less likely to perspire in summer if the gloves worn are a little larger than those usually selected. The advantage of large gloves is that the extra size permits of slight entrance of air, which dries the moisture as it exudes. Porus leather, such as chamois and suede, are cooler than dog skin and dressed kid, because air cannot easily penetrate the latter.

Were large gloves worn constantly perspiring hands would be unknown, save where physical weakness takes this form. There can be no difficulty in discovering whether or not the moisture denotes a lowered condition of the system, for when it does, hands perspire excessively under all conditions with gloves or without.

When this happens some good tonic should be taken internally, and an external application that may stimulate the palms to better condition is made from two ounces of cologne and a quarter of an ounce of tincture of bella donna. This is put on several times a day, rubbing it on the pores.

Before putting on gloves the hands must be powdered with a mixture of one grain each of boric acid and oxide of zinc, two drams of lycopodium powder, one-half ounce of starch and a quarter of an ounce of powdered orris. These are all blended by forcing them through coarse muslin.

The object of all external treatment is to shrink the pores so they will not give off moisture in large quantities, and frequent wiping with spirits of camphor through the day will aid in this process. Another excellent shrinking tonic is made from one dram of turpentine in which a dram of isinglass is softened. When the mixture can be worked it is blended with two drams of oxide of zinc ointment, and this is rubbed into the palms several times a day, dusting the flesh afterward with the powder, formula for which is given above.

DRINK IN THE SUBARCTICS

Writing on conditions in Labrador, Dr. Wilfrid T. Grenfell, the noted missionary physician of the coast, states: "A careful study of the health conditions of the coast by the doctors of our staff all these years has shown that there is no need for liquor whatever in these subarctic climates; that on the contrary, the first man to go down in hard physical conditions is almost always the drinking man. Among men on the sea the dangers from its use are enormously enhanced."

The farmer should strive to "get upstairs" in his business, the same as any other man in any other occupation.

THE MAIL'S DAILY

FASHION HINTS

LADIES' SHIRTWAIST.
Paris Pattern No. 2749
All Seams Allowed.

The model illustrated is an excellent one for a plain tailored shirtwaist of taffeta silk or any of the striped or plain colored wash silks which are so pretty and practical to wear with the short skirt and long coat of serge, mohair or flannel, which are such a rage at the present time. It is also adaptable to heavy linen, Indian-head cotton, madras, Victoria lawn, Persian lawn or pique. It is slightly gathered at the waist line at the front and back and closes at the center-front under a moderately wide box-plait. The collar is of white linen, or it may be of the same material as the waist and of the turn-down or Dutch variety. The sleeves are slightly gathered into the armholes and finished with straight cuffs if they are long or with deep turn-back cuffs if a three-quarter model is used. Fine chafis is being used to a great extent for these between-season shirtwaists this year, and cashmere or cotton crepe are also adaptable, as they will all wash quite as easily as the linen or China silk waists and will last a trifle longer. The great advantage of the cotton crepe waist is that it needs no ironing, being simply wrung out and hung up to dry. The pattern is in eight sizes—32 to 46 inches bust measure. For 36 bust the waist requires 3 3/4 yards of material 20 inches wide, 3 yards 27 yards wide, 2 1/4 yards 36 inches wide or 1 3/4 yards 42 inches wide.

Price of Pattern 10 cents.
